vî-sê (2), s. [Fr., pa. par. of vîser = to put a visé to, from Lat. visus, pa. par. of video = to see.] An indorsement made upon a passport by the properly constituted authority, whether ambassador, consul, or police, showing that it has been examined and found correct.

vîse (3), s. [VICE, s.]

vî-sê, v.t. [VISE (2), s.] To put a visé on; to examine and indorse, as a passport.

Vish'-noó, Vish'-nú, s. [Sans., from vis = to enter, to pervade.]

Brahmanism: The second person of the modern Hindoo Trimurti (q.v.). When he first appears in Vedic times, he is simply the God of the Shining Firmament, the younger brother of Indra, and inferior to him in dignity. By the time that the epic poems, the Ramayana and the Mahabharat, were composed, Vishnoo had made a considerable advance to his present position, the full attainment of which, however, was reserved for the period of the Puranas. One of these books is called the Vishnoo Purana. He is regarded as the member of the Triad whose special function is to preserve. To do this he nine times successively became incarnate, and will do so once more. The first time he appeared, it was as a fish to warn a righteous king, Manu, of an approaching deluge, and save the sacred Vedas from being lost. His second appearance was as a tortoise to support the world, while the gods and goddesses churned the sea; the third, as a bear, to lift up the submerged world on his tusks; the fourth, as a man-lion, to tear to pieces an impious king; the fifth, as a dwarf, to recover for the gods their supremacy lost by their neglect; the sixth, as Parasurama, to wash away the sins of the earth by the destruction of the Kshatriya race—probably an allusion to the historic fact that when the Aryan Brahmas and Kshatriya warriors had well established themselves in India, jealousies arose between them, and the Kshatriyas were vanquished, and in large measure destroyed, by the Brahmas; and the seventh, as Rama, the hero of the Ramayana; the eighth, as Krishna; the ninth, as Boodha; and the tenth, as Kalki, or the White Horse, is still to come. When it arrives, Vishnoo shall appear on a white horse, with a drawn sword, wherewith he shall destroy the wicked, and thus prepare the way for a renovated world. Vishnoo himself is generally represented as a dark-blue man, with four arms, the first holding a war-club, the second a conch-shell, the third a quail-like weapon called Chakra, and the fourth a water-lily. His two most popular incarnations are as Rama and Krishna. His most enthusiastic followers are generally drawn from the middle classes of Hindoo society. His mark on their forehead is a trident, with a yellow fork in the centre, and a white one on each side. Many monastic sects worship him almost exclusively. [VAISHNAVA.]

vîs-i-bil'-i-tý, s. [Fr. visibilité.] The quality or state of being visible or perceivable by the eye; perceptibility, conspicuousness.

"Deplet him that hath no colour or figure, no parts nor body, no accidents or visibility."—Bp. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. ii., ch. ii.

vîs-i-ble, *vys-y-ble, a. & s. [Fr., from Lat. visibilis, from visus, pa. par. of video = to see; Sp. visible; Ital. visibile.]

A. As adjective:

1. Perceivable by the sight; capable of being seen; perceptible by the eye; in view.

"The visible world, the proper object of sight, is not external, but in the mind."—Read: On the Mind, ch. vi., § 11.

2. Apparent, open, conspicuous.

"Though his actions were not visible."—Sherk: Cymbeline, III. 4.

B. As subst.: That which is or can be seen by the eye.

"The mathematical consideration of visible figures, which we shall call the geometry of visibility."—Leid: On the Mind, ch. vi., § 8.

Visible Church, s.

Theol.: The Church, as seen by man, not as it appears to God. It includes the whole body of professing Christians, some of them regenerate, others unregenerate; the two classes commingled, as were the wheat and tares mentioned in the parable (Matt. xiii. 24-30). It is distinguished from the Invisible Church, consisting only of the regenerate;

but who are worthy of this designation is known only to God. (Cf. 1 Kings xix. 10, 14, 18.)

visible-horizon, s. The line that bounds the sight.

visible-speech, s. A term applied by its inventor, Prof. A. Melville Bell, to a system of alphabetical characters designed to represent every possible articulate utterance of the organs of speech, each organ and each mode of speech having its appropriate symbol. By means of this system the deaf and dumb are taught to speak.

vîs'-i-ble-néss, s. [Eng. visible; -ness.] The quality or state of being visible; visibility.

vîs'-i-blý, *vys-y-blý, adv. [Eng. visibl(e); -ly.]

1. In a visible manner; so as to be perceivable by the eye; openly, manifestly, plainly, perceptibly.

"By the head we make known more visibly our applications, our threatenings."—Dryden: Todd.

2. Plainly, clearly, evidently, manifestly.

"Visibly beneficial to all."—Locke: Human Understanding, bk. i., ch. III.

vîs'-ie, viz'-ie, s. [Fr. visée = an aim, taking a sight at, from vîser = to aim, to mark.] [VISE.]

1. The aim taken at an object, as by one about to shoot.

2. A scrutinizing view or look.

3. The knot or sight on the muzzle of a gun by which aim is taken.

¶ Scotch in all its senses.

vî-siér, *s. [VIZIER.]

Vîs'-i-góth, s. [See def.] One of the Western Goths, or that branch of the Gothic tribes which settled in Dacia, as distinguished from the Ostrogoths, or Eastern Goths. [OSRNOGOTH.]

Vîs'-i-góth-ic, a. [Eng. Visigoth; -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Visigoths.

vîs'-lôn (s as zh), *vîs-i-oun, *vys-y-on, *vys-lon, s. [Fr. vision = a vision, sight, from Lat. visionem, accus. of visio = sight, from visus, pa. par. of video = to see; cogn. with Sansc. vid = to know; Goth. & A.S. witan; Eng. wit, wot.]

1. The act of seeing external objects; actual sight.

"The intuitive vision of God in the world to come."—Hooker: Eccles. Politi, bk. I., § 11.

2. The faculty of seeing; that power or faculty by which we perceive the forms and colours of objects through the sense of sight; sight.

"And these pictures, projected by motion along the fibres of the optic nerves into the brain, are the cause of vision."—Newton: Opticks.

3. That which is seen or perceived by the eye; an object of sight.

4. Specif., that which is seen otherwise than by the ordinary sight, or the rational eye; a supernatural, prophetic, or imaginary appearance; something seen in a trance, dream, ecstasy, or the like; a phantom, a spectre, an apparition.

"Upon the foot of this construction, it is supposed that Isaiah in prophetic dream or vision heard God speaking to him (like as St. Peter heard a voice, and saw a vision, while he lay in a trance), and that in idea he transacted all that God so ordered him to do."—Waterland: Works, vi. 228.

5. Anything unreal or imaginary; a creation of fancy.

¶ Vision is the act of seeing or the thing seen; apparition, the thing that appears. Vision, signifying a thing seen, is taken for a supernatural exertion of the vision; apparition refers us to the object seen, which may be true or false, according to the manner in which it presents itself. Joseph was warned by a vision to fly into Egypt; Mary Magdalen was informed of the resurrection by an apparition; feverish people often think they see visions; timid and credulous people sometimes take trees and posts for apparitions. Strictly speaking, a phantom is a false apparition, or the appearance of a thing otherwise than it really is; thus the ignis-fatuus, or will-o'-the-wisp, is a phantom. A spectre is the apparition of any spiritual being; a ghost is the spirit of a dead person appearing to the living. (Crabb.)

(1) Arç of vision:

Astron.: An arc which measures the least distance at which, after sunset, a fixed star or planet emerging from the sun's rays becomes visible.

(2) Beatific vision: [BEATIFIC.]

(3) Direct (or simple) vision:

Optics: Vision performed by means of rays passing directly or in straight lines from the radiat point to the eye. The distance at which objects can be seen with the greatest distinctness varies in different individuals, and in the same individual it is often different in the two eyes. For small objects, such as ordinary print, it is from fourteen to fifteen inches in normal cases.

(4) Field of vision:

Optics: The same as Field of view (q.v.).

(5) Reflected vision:

Optics: Vision performed by means of rays reflected as by mirrors.

(6) Refracted vision:

Optics: Vision performed by means of rays refracted or deviated by passing through mediums of different densities.

vîs'-lôn (s as zh), v.t. [VISION, s.] To see as in a vision; to perceive by the eye of the intellect or imagination.

"We in the morning eyed the pleasant fields Visioned before."—Southey: Joan of Arc, VIII.

vîs'-lôn-ál (s as zh), a. [Eng. vision, s.; -al.] Pertaining or relating to vision.

"Under the veer of guise Lo thus was hid the treacherie."
Gower: C. A., bk. II.

visor-bearer, vizor-bearer, s.

Ornith.: A popular name for any species of the genus Augastes, from the fantastic arrangement of the feathers of the head. Two species are known, Augastes superbus and A. tumacHELLus, both from Brazil.

• visor-mask, s. A prostitute, a strumpet.

"The visor-mask that ventored her half-crown."
J. Banks: Virtus Betrayed. (Epilogue.)

vis-ored, a. [Eng. visor; -ed.] Wearing a visor; masked, disguised, concealed.

"Visor'd falsehood and base forgery."
Milton: Comus, 599.

• vis-ör-y, a. [Lat. visus = sight.] Visual; having power of vision.

"The optic nerves and the visory spirits."—Adams: Works, II, 379.

vis'-ta, s. [Ital. = sight, a prospect, a view, fem. of visito, pa. par. of vedere = to see, from Lat. video.] A view or prospect through an avenue, as between rows of trees; hence, applied to the trees or other objects forming an avenue, and (figuratively) to a mental forecast or retrospect embracing a series of occurrences.

• vis'-tö, s. [VISTA.] A vista; a prospect.

"Thee all bestide this glade and vista, You'd see aymphing like Callisto."
Gay: To a Young Lady.

vis'-u-al, *vis'-u-all (or s as zh), a. [Fr. visual, from Lat. visualis = pertaining to the sight, from visus = sight, vision (q.v.); Sp. & Port. visual; Ital. visuale.]

1. Of or pertaining to sight or seeing; used in sight or seeing; serving as the instrument of seeing.

"Visual beams refracted through another's eye."—Drayton: Poly Oibion. (To the Reader.)

• 2. Visible; perceptible by the sight.

"Many remarkable particulars that attended his *sur*t perceptions and judgments on visual objects."—Burke: Sublime & Beautiful, § 115.

visual-angle, s. [OPTIC-ANGLE, 1.]

visual-ooze, s.

Perspect.: A cone whose vertex is at the point of sight.

visual-plane, s.

Perspect.: Any plane passing through the point of sight.

visual-point, s.

Perspect.: A point in the horizontal line in which all the visual rays unite.

visual-purple, s.

Physiol.: A pigment, of a purple color, occurring in the retina of some Vertebrates. Under the action of light, it becomes first what Foster proposes to call a visual yellow, and then a visual white. (Foster: Physiol. (ed. 4th), p. 517.)

visual-rays, s. pl.

Optics: Rays of light, imagined to come from the object to the eye.

visual-white, s. [VISUAL-PURPLE.]

visual-yellow, s. [VISUAL-PURPLE.]

• vis'-u-äl'-i-tý (or s as zh), s. [Eng. visual; -ity.] A sight; a glimpse.

"We must . . . catch a few more visualities."—Carlyle: Miscell., IV, 242.

vis'-u-al-ize, vis'-u-al-ise (or vis as vizh), v.t. & t. [Eng. visual; -ize, -ise.]

• A. Trans.: To make visual or visible.

"What, is this met? A Voice, a Motion, an Appearance—some embodied visualized idea to the eternal mind."—Carlyle: Sartor Resartus, bk. I, ch. VIII.

• B. Intrans.: To call up a mental image or picture with a distinctness approaching actual vision.

"All this is difficult to understand by the great majority of persons who cannot visualize."—Athenaeum, March 29, 1890.

vis'-süs, s. [Lat. = a seeing, a looking.]

Law: View or inspection. (Cowell.)

vi-tä'-çö-ö, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vitæ(s); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Vine-works; an order of Hypogynous Exogens, alliance Berberales. Scrambling, climbing shrubs with tumid separable joints, or erect bushes; woody tissue having large, dotted ducts, at certain seasons pouring forth sap. Leaves simple or compound, the lower ones opposite, the upper alternate; peduncles racemose, often opposite, the leaves sometimes changed into tendrils; flowers small, green, in thyrses, umbels, or panicles; calyx small, its margin nearly entire; petals four or five, inserted in a disc surrounding the ovary; stamens equal in number to the petals and opposite them, also inserted in the disc; style one, very short; stigma simple; ovary superior, two to six-celled; ovules erect, definite in number; berry round, pulpy, often by abortion one-celled; seeds four or five, long. Found in the East India and other warm countries. Tribes two, Vitæe and Leeæ; known genera seven; species 260. (Lindley.)

• vit-aille, s. [VITUALS.]

vi'-tal, *vi'-tall, *vy-tall, a. & s. [Fr. vital, from Lat. vitalis = pertaining to life, from vita = life; vita is prob. short for vitata, and silled to vivo = to live; Sp. & Port. vital; Ital. vitale.]

A. As adjective:

1. Of or pertaining to life, animal or vegetable.

"When I have pluck'd the rose
I cannot give it vital growth again."
Shakspeare: Othello, v. 2.

2. Contributing to life; necessary to or supporting life.

"His coffee-bled spright Can sock this vital sire into his breast."
Spenser: F. Q., II, vii. 64.

3. Containing life; life-giving.

"Vital spark of heavenly flame, Quit, oh quit this mortal frame."
Pope: Dying Christian to his Soul.

4. Being the seat of life; being that on which life depends; as, To be wounded in a vital part of the body.

5. Viable (q.v.).

"Pythagoras and Hippocrates not only affirm the birth of the seventh month to be vital."—Brown.

6. Very necessary or important; indispensable, essential.

B. As subst.: [VITALS.]

vital-affinity, s.

Chem. & Physiol.: The changes in the chemical qualities in the nutrient material of a plant or animal after the former has acquired determinate form. [METABOLIC.]

• vital-air, s. An old name for oxygen, as essential to animal life.

vital-capacity, s. [VITAL-VOLUME.]

vital-contractility, s. [CONTRACTILITY, ¶.]

vital-fluid, s.

Bot.: Latex (q.v.). (Schultz.)

vital-force, s. [VITALITY, II.]

vital-functions, s. pl. Those functions or faculties of the body on which life immediately depends, as respiration, the circulation of the blood, &c.

vital-principle, s.

Biol.: The principle which, in association with matter, as in organized bodies, controls its manifestations and properties. Nothing is known of it, except as a force in connection with organization. (Carpenter.)

vital-vessels, s. pl.

Bot.: Laticiferous tissue (q.v.). (Schultz.)

vital-volume, vital-capacity, s.

Physiol.: Dr. Hutchinson's name for the quantity of air expired from the lungs after the most complete inspiration. It always increases with stature, and is measured by the spirometer (q.v.).

• vi-täl'-ic, a. [Eng. vital; -ic.] Of or pertaining to life; vital.

"Successive elevations of vitalic character."—Poe: Eureka (Works, 1864), II, 173.

vi-täl'-ism, s. [Eng. vital; -ism.]

Biol.: The doctrine which holds that the vital principle or vitality is something distinct from physical forces.

vi-täl'-ist, s. & a. [Eng. vital; -ist.]

A. As subst.: A believer or supporter of Vitalism (q.v.).

"The development of Biological Science has progressed contemporaneously with the successive victories gained by the physicists over the vitalists."—Nicholson: Zoology (ed. 1878), p. 10.

B. As adjective:

• 1. Of or pertaining to Vitalism (q.v.).

• 2. Of or pertaining to the Germ-theory (q.v.).

vi-täl'-i-tý, s. [Lat. vitalitas, from vitalis = vital (q.v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The state of showing vital powers or capacities; the principle of animation or of life.

"Whether that motion, vitality, and operation, were by locubation or how else."—Raleigh: History of the World, bk. I, ch. 1.

2. Animation; manifestation of life or alert-ness; life; as, an institution devoid of vitality.

II. Biol.: (See extract.)

"Considered apart from the phenomena of consciousness, the phenomena of life are all dependent upon the working of the same physical and chemical forces as those which are active in the rest of the world. It may be convenient to use the terms 'vitality' and 'vital force' to denote the causes of certain great groups of natural operations, as we employ the names of 'electricity' and 'electrical force' to denote others; but it ceases to be proper to do so, if such a name implies the absurd assumption that either 'electricity' or 'vitality' are entities playing the part of efficient causes of electrical or vital phenomena."—Huxley: Anat. Invert. Anim., p. 9.

vi-täl-i-zä'-tion, s. [Eng. vitaliz(e); -ation.] The act or process of vitalizing; the act of infusing the vital principle.

vi-täl-ize, v.t. [Eng. vital; -ize.] To give life to; to infuse the vital principle into; to animate.

vi-täl'-ly, adv. [Eng. vital; -ly.]

1. In a vital manner; so; as to give or receive life.

"New particles of matter vitally united to the living plant."—Locke: Human Understand., bk. II, ch. xxvii.

2. Essentially, indispensably.

3. In a manner affecting the very existence of a thing; in a highly important manner or degree.

"Those whose interests were more vitally affected."—Daily Telegraph, Sept. 22, 1864.

vi-täl's, s. pl. [VITAL.]

1. The internal parts or organs of animals essential to life. (Used vaguely or generally.)

"The inextinguishable vital Drawn from his vitals."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vi.

2. The parts of a complex whole essential to its life, existence, or soundness.

vi-tä-scöpe, s. [Lat. vita = life; Gr. skopö = to see.] An apparatus devised by Edison, combining the principles of the kinetograph, kinetoscope, and stereopticon. By its use life-sized moving pictures, as of a boxing-match, horse-race, etc. are projected upon a screen, showing all the action, and even the colors, of the original scene. A favorite subject is that of ocean waves breaking on the coast, in which the realism may be intensified by the use of a large phonograph or theatrophone in reproducing the roar of the surf.

vi-të-ö, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vitæ(s); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: The typical tribe of Vitaceæ (q.v.). Tendrils present, petals distinct, stamens also distinct; ovules in pairs.

• vit'-öl-lar-y, s. [Lat. vitellus = the yolk of an egg.] The place where the yolk of an egg awims in the white.

"The vitalary, or place of the yolk, is very high."—Brown: Vulgar Errors, bk. III, ch. xxviii.

vi-tël'-li-cle, s. [Dimin. from Lat. vitellus (q.v.).]

Biol.: The bag developed round the food-yolk, or that part of the yolk not converted into the germ-mass and embryo. The constricted part at which it is continued into the wall of the intestinal canal is called the Vitelline duct.

• vi-tël'-lin, s. [Eng. vitell(us); -in, -ine.]

Chem.: A name formerly given to the albuminoidal substance of the yoke of birds' eggs, now known to be a mixture of albumin and casein.

vi-tël'-line, a. [VITELLUS.]

1. Of or pertaining to the yolk of eggs, more especially to the dentoplasm.

2. Colored like the yolk of an egg; dull yellow, just turning to red.

vitelline-duct, s. [VITELLICLE.]

fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wë, wët, hère, camël, hër, thère; pine, pít, síre, sír, marine; gö, pöt, or, wöre, wëlf, wörk, whö, sön; müte, cüb, cüre, quite, cür, rüle, füll; trý, Sýrian. æ, ö = ë; ey = ä; qu = kw.

vitelline-membrane, s.

Anat.: The firm, transparent, vesicular membrane surrounding the yolk of an egg; the yolk-sac. Called also Zona pellicida.

vi-tél-lús, s. [Lat. = the yolk of an egg.]

1. Anat.: The yolk of an ovum or egg. It is a mass of granular protoplasm filling the vesicle, and having suspended in it a multitude of oil-globules of variable size. It contains also the germinal vesicle (q.v.) and the germinal spot or macula.

2. Bot.: Gartner's name for a fleshy sac interposed between the albumen and the ovuls, and enveloping the latter. Robert Brown found that it was the sac of the anion in a thickened state.

vi-téx, s. [Lat. = the chaste tree. (See def.)]

Bot.: The typical genus of Vitaceae. Calyx short, campanulate, five-toothed; corolla irregular, five-lobed, somewhat labiate; stamens four, didynamous; fruit a globose berry, covered at its base by the calyx, and containing four one-seeded cells. Vitex Agnus-castus is the chaste-tree, a native of Southern Europe. It has digitate leaves, with five to seven leaflets, fragrant flowers, and globose fruits with an acrid and aromatic taste. [AGNUS-CASTUS.] Vitex trifolia, the Wild Pepper, is a small tree or shrub, wild in India and Burmah. The roots yield a sweet, greenish oil. It is believed that an oil can be extracted also from the seeds. The plant is anodyne, diuretic, and emmenagogue. Vitex Negundo is a shrub with pretty blue flowers found in India, Ceylon, and Cochinchina. Its ashes are largely used as an alkali in dyeing. Its root is considered by the Hindoos to be tonic, febrifugal, and expectorant, and its leaves aromatic, tonic, and vermifugal; the dried fruits are also vermifugal. A pillow stuffed with the leaves is said to relieve headache, and a vapour bath prepared with them is employed in Mysore in fever, catarrh, and rheumatism. The bark and roots of V. leucocylon, a large deciduous tree from India and Burmah, are astringent; its fruit is eaten by the Burmese. Mr. E. B. Manson believes that its wood and that of V. altissima, the latter a large Indian tree, would be useful for furniture. The bark of V. Taruma is given in Brazil in syphilitic affections.

vi-tí-ti-ō, s. [Lat. = the chaste tree. (See def.)]

Bot.: The typical genus of Vitaceae. Calyx short, campanulate, five-toothed; corolla irregular, five-lobed, somewhat labiate; stamens four, didynamous; fruit a globose berry, covered at its base by the calyx, and containing four one-seeded cells. Vitex Agnus-castus is the chaste-tree, a native of Southern Europe. It has digitate leaves, with five to seven leaflets, fragrant flowers, and globose fruits with an acrid and aromatic taste. [AGNUS-CASTUS.] Vitex trifolia, the Wild Pepper, is a small tree or shrub, wild in India and Burmah. The roots yield a sweet, greenish oil. It is believed that an oil can be extracted also from the seeds. The plant is anodyne, diuretic, and emmenagogue. Vitex Negundo is a shrub with pretty blue flowers found in India, Ceylon, and Cochinchina. Its ashes are largely used as an alkali in dyeing. Its root is considered by the Hindoos to be tonic, febrifugal, and expectorant, and its leaves aromatic, tonic, and vermifugal; the dried fruits are also vermifugal. The art, process, or operation of vitrifying, or of converting into glass, or a glassy substance, by heat.

vi-tí-rí-fác-tūre, s. [VITRIFICATION.]

The manufacture of glass.

vi-tí-rí-fí-a-ble, a. [Eng. vitrify; -able.]

Capable of being vitrified or converted into glass by heat and fusion. "I remarked that at Dun Mac Sineachain itself the materials of the hill itself were not vitrifiable."—Macculloch: Highlands & Western Isles of Scotland, I. 392.

vi-tríf-ic-a-ble, a. [Eng. vitrify; c connect., and suff. -able.]

Capable of being converted into glass; vitrifiable. "We have glasses of divers kinds, and amongst them some of metals vitrified, and other materials."—Bacon: New Atlantis.

vi-tí-rí-fí-cā-tiōn, s. [Fr.] [VITRIFICATION.]

The act or process of converting into glass by means of heat. "Therefore vitrification maketh bodies brittle."—Brown: Vulgar Errors, bk. ii, ch. v.

vi-tí-rí-fíed, pa. par. & a. [VITRIFY.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb). B. As adj.: Converted into glass or a glassy substance.

vitrified forts, s. pl.

A class of prehistoric hill fortresses, principally found on the crests of hills in the Scotch Highlands, but occurring also in France, the walls of which are partially or entirely transformed into a glassy substance. The Scotch vitrified forts were first made known, in 1777, in a series of published letters to G. C. M., Esq., Edinburgh, by Mr. John Williams, a civil engineer, who was then conducting mining operations in the Scotch Highlands under the Board of Annexed (i.e., Forfeited) Estates. Williams's discovery was first doubted, then discussion arose whether the vitrified forts were extinct volcanoes or artificial productions. Now the volcanic hypothesis is quite exploded, and the eruptions are regarded as old forts. Their vitrification seems to have been intentional, and to have been facilitated by the employment of rocks easy of fusion, such as granite, limestone, &c., these being often brought from a distance when less fusible rocks might have easily been obtained from the vicinity.

vít-ri-form, a. [Lat. vitrum = glass, and forma = form.] Having the form or appearance of glass; resembling glass.

vít-ri-fy, v.t. & t. [Fr. vitriifier, from Lat. vitrum = glass, and facio (pass. fi) = to make.]

A. Trans.: To convert into glass or a glassy substance by heat and fusion.

B. Intrans.: To become glass; to be converted into glass.

"Besides we see metals will vitrify."—Bacon: Physiological Remains.

vít-tri-na, s. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. vitrum = glass.]

Zool.: Glass-snail; a genus of Helicidae, with eighty-seven species, most abundant in northern parts of the Old World. Shell imperforate, very thin, depressed; spire short, last whorl large; animal elongated, too large for complete retraction into shell. The species are occasionally animal-feeders, like the slugs.

vít-ri-ól, *vít-ri-ole, s. [Fr. vitriol; Prov. vitriole; Sp. & Port. vitriolo; Ital. vitriolo; Low Lat. vitriolum, from Lat. vitrum = glass. Named perhaps from its colour and translucency.]

Chem.: An old name for sulphates, still often used in commerce, and sometimes erroneously applied to sulphuric acid. The vitriols are distinguished by their colours or the metals they contain: White, or Zinc Vitriol; Green, or Iron Vitriol; Lead and Nickel Vitriols, &c.

¶ Oil of vitriol: (SULPHURIC-ACID).

vitriol-ochre, s.

Min.: The same as GLOCKERITE (q.v.).

vitriol-throwing, s.

1. Lit.: The act of throwing vitriol in the face of a person as an act of private vengeance.

2. Fig.: Violent abuse.

"This sort of vitriol throwing is not even effective as controversy."—St. James's Gazette, Dec. 13, 1857.

vít-ri-ó-lâte, v.t. [Eng. vitriol; -ate.] To convert into a vitriol, as iron pyrites, by the absorption of oxygen, which reduces the iron to an oxide and the sulphur to sulphuric acid. Thus, the sulphate of iron, when vitriolated, becomes sulphate of iron, or green vitriol.

vít-ri-ó-lâte, vít-ri-ó-lât-éd, a. [VITRIOLATE, v.]

1. Converted into a sulphate or a vitriol.

"A vitriolate or copperous quality."—Brownie: Fuller Errors, bk. vi, ch. xii.

2. Impregnated with vitriol.

"Iron may be dissolved by any tart, salt, or vitriolated water."—Bacon: Physiological Remains.

vít-ri-ó-lá-tion, s. [VITRIOLATE, v.] The act or process of converting into a sulphate or a vitriol.

vít-ri-ó-líc, a. [Eng. vitriol; -lic.]

1. Lit.: Pertaining to vitriol; having the qualities of vitriol; obtained from vitriol.

"A vitriolic substance, tasting like alum."—Cook: Second Voyage, bk. ii, ch. v.

2. Fig.: Sharp, biting, bitter, malignant.

"Followed by one of Mr. L.—a pungent vitriolic discharge of undiluted Radicalism."—Evening Standard, Oct. 3, 1858.

vít-ri-ó-line, a. [Eng. vitriol; -ine.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling vitriol; vitriolic.

"In a moorish, boggy ground arsech a Spring of a vitriolous taste and odour."—Fulter: Worthies; Wiltz, II, 428.

vít-ri-ó-liz-a-ble, a. [Eng. vitrioliz(e); -able.] Capable of being vitriolized or converted into a vitriol.

vít-ri-ó-lí-zá-tion, s. [Eng. vitrioliz(e); -ation.] The act or process of vitriolizing; vitriolation.

vít-ri-ó-lize, v.t. [Eng. vitriol; -ize.]

1. To convert into a vitriol; to vitriolate.

2. To poison or injure with vitriol.

"The jury did not believe that the child from the same native vitriolized himself."—Daily News, March 15, 1856.

vít-tri-ó-loús, a. [Eng. vitriol; -ous.] Containing vitriol; vitriolic.

vít-tró, s. [Ital., from Lat. vitrum = glass.] (See compound.)

vitro de trino, s. Reticulated-glass (q.v.).

vít-ró-type, s. [Lat. vitrum = glass, and Eng. type.]

Phot.: A name given to the processes which involve the production of collodion film pictures on glass.

vít-trú-vi-an, a. (See def.) Of or pertaining to Mrcena Vitruvius Pollio, a celebrated Roman architect, born about 80 B.C.

vitruvian-scroll, s.

—A distinct and indisputable way of vivency.—Brome: Vulgar Errors, bk. II, ch. I.

vi-ver-ra, s. [Lat. = a ferret.]

Zool.: Civet-cat; the type genus of Viverridae (q.v.), with the range of the family. Body elongated and compressed; head pointed in front, ears rather small; extremities short, feet small and rounded; toes short, five on each foot; tail moderate or long; a pair of large glandular follicles, situated on the perineum, in both sexes, and secreting in most species an oily substance of a penetrating odour. All the species are extremely active, fierce, and rapacious, and feed chiefly on small mammals and birds. The genus is an extensive one, and is often divided into groups, to which some naturalists give generic rank. The chief are (1) Viverra proper, including the largest species. Fur rather long and loose, and elongated in the median line of the neck and back, as to form a sort of creast or mane. (2) Viverricula, and (3) Genetta, containing smaller species, differing slightly from the first group in dentition.

vi-ver-ra-vus, s. [Mod. Lat. viverra(a), and Lat. avus = an ancestor.] [VIVERRIDÆ, 2.]

vi-ver-ric-u-la, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from viverra (q.v.).] [VIVERRA.]

vi-ver-ri-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. viverra(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

1. Zool.: A family of Carnivorous Mammals, section Euloiroidea, confined to the Old World; . m. 3 or 4, m. 3; digits usually 4, but the pollex or hallux, or both, may be wanting. There are three sub-families: Cryptoproctinae, Viverrinae, and Herpestinae.

2. Paleont.: The family commences in the Eocene, in which formation in America Viverrans occurs.

vi-ver-ri-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. viverra(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Zool.: The typical sub-family of Viverridae (q.v.), with several genera, having approximately the range of the family.

vi-ver-rine, a. & s. [VIVERRINÆ.]

A. As adj.: Of, belonging to, or resembling the sub-family Viverrinae or the genus Viverra.

—A curious orthic modification of the Viverrine type.—Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th), xv. 436.

B. As subst.: Any individual of the sub-family Viverrinae or the genus Viverra (q.v.).

—All the essential characters . . . of a "Viverrine."—Prof. Parker, in Cassell's Nat. Hist., II, 86.

viverrine-cat, s.

Zool.: Felis viverrina, a large Tiger-cat, from India. Ears small and blunt, fur coarse and dull, limbs short and strong; snout narrow, and drawn out like that of a Civet, whence the specific name; colour gray, lighter beneath, banded and spotted with black. The skull is remarkable from the fact that the orbit is completed behind by bone, which is quite exceptional among the Carnivora.

viverrine-dasyure, s.

Zool.: A variety of Dasyurus mauget from New South Wales and Van Dieman's Land. General colour black, brown, or gray; head and body spotted with white, under parts white.

viv-ers, s. [Fr. vivres = provisions, victuals, from vivre; Lat. vivo = to live.] Food, eatables, provisiona, victuals. (Scotch.)

vives, s. [Fr. vivres, from vite = lively, brisk; eau vive = running water, because the animals are said to contract this complaint through drinking running water. (Linnæus.)] [VIVES.]

vi-vi-ri-a, s. [Named after Signor Viviana, M.D., a botanist of Genoa.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Vivianiaceæ (q.v.). Undershrubs with opposite ovate leaves, covered beneath with white down, and terminal panicles of white, pink, or purple flowers. Natives of Chili and Brazil.

vi-vi-ri-a-ni-a, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. viviana(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -acæ.]

Bot.: Vivianiada; an order of Hypogynous Exogens, alliance Malvales. Herbs or undershrubs, with hoary or whorled, exstipulate leaves. Flowers in panicles or corymbs, white, red, or pink. Calyx ten-ribbed, with five divisions; petals five, with claws often remaining, after withering around the ovary; stamens ten; filaments distinct; anthers two-celled; stigmas three, sessile; ovary free, three-celled; ovules two in each cell, one ascending, the other suspended; capsule three-lobed, three-celled; seeds roughish. Natives of Chili and the South of Brazil. Known genera four, species fifteen. (Lindley.)

vi-vi-ri-a-ni-âd, s. [Mod. Lat. viviana(a); Eng. suff. -ad.]

Bot. (Pl.): The order Vivianiaceæ (q.v.). (Lindley.)

vi-vi-ri-an-ite, s. [After the English mineralogist, J. G. Vivian; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral crystallizing in the monoclinic system, but sometimes occurring in an earthy form. Hardness, 1.5 to 2; sp. gr. 2.58 to 2.68; lustre on cleavage faces pearly, others vitreous; colourless when pure, but, owing to the rapid oxidation of the iron, changing to blue or green; transparent to translucent. Compos.: phosphoric acid, 28.7; protoxide of iron, 45.0; water, 28.7 = 100, which is equivalent to the formula 3FeO, PO₅+8HO.

vi-vi-ri-d, a. [Lat. vividus = animated, true to life, from vivus = alive; Fr. vivide; Ital. vivido.]

1. Exhibiting the appearance of life or freshness; clear, bright, fresh, lively; life-like, strong, intense.

—A bed of tulips presents only a glare of vivid colours.—Keats: Winter Evening, even. 7.

2. Forming brilliant images, or painting in bright colours; life-like, striking, realistic; giving a striking or life-like character or account.

—Being minute without being dull, and vivid without undue diffusiveness.—Daily Telegraph, Dec. 19, 1885.

*vi-vi-d-i-ty, s. [Eng. vivid; -ity.] The quality or state of being vivid; vividness.

vi-vi-d-ly, adv. [Eng. vivid; -ly.]

1. In a vivid manner; with strength or intensity.

—Full of the innocent sufferer sees Too clearly, feels too vividly.—Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. IV.

2. In bright, clear, or glowing colours; in a striking or realistic manner; so as to present a life-like picture to the mind; as, a scene vividly described.

vi-vi-d-ness, s. [Eng. vivid; -ness.]

1. The quality or state of being vivid; liveliness, vivacity, brightness, intensity.

—The vividness of their scarlet colour.—Daily Telegraph, Aug. 29, 1885.

2. Strength of colouring; strikingness; as, the vividness of a description.

*vi-vi-f-ic, *vi-vi-f-ick, *vi-vi-f-ic-a-l, a. [Lat. vivificus, from vivus = alive, and facio (pass. fio) = to make.] [VIVIFY.] Giving life, making alive; vivifying.

—Without whose entreaty and vivific beams all motion, both animal, vital, and natural, would speedily cease.—Ray: On the Creation, pt. I.

*vi-vi-f-i-cant, a. [Lat. vivificans, pr. par. of vivifico = to vivify (q.v.).] Vivific, vivifying.

—Which hath no vivificant nor quickening power.—P. Holland: Putrebek, p. 685.

*vi-vi-f-i-cate, v.t. [Lat. vivificatus, pa. par. of vivifico = to vivify (q.v.).]

1. Ord. Lang.: To give life to; to animate, to vivify.

—God vivificates and actuates the whole world.—More: Philosophical Cabbala, ch. I.

2. Old Chem.: To restore or reduce to the natural or to a metallic state, as metal from an oxide, solution, or the like; to revive.

*vi-vi-fi-câ-tion, s. [Fr.] [VIVIFICATE.] The act of vivifying or giving life; the state of being vivified; the act of vivificating; revival.

—The nature of vivification is very worthy the enquiry.—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 685.

*vi-vi-fi-câ-tive, a. [Eng. vivificat(e); -ive.] Tending or able to vivify, animate, or give life; capable of vivifying.

—That lower vivificative principle of his soul did grow strong.—More: Philosophical Cabbala, ch. I.

vi-vi-fy, *vi-vi-fic, v.t. & i. [Fr. vivifier, from Lat. vivifico, from vivus = alive, and facio (pass. fio) = to make.]

A. Trans.: To endue with life; to animate, to quicken; to give life to.

—Out-worms, as soon as vivified, creep into the stomach for nutriment.—Harvey: On Conception.

B. Intrans.: To impart life or animation; to quicken.

—Which should show, that know hath in it a secret warmth; for else it could hardly vivify.—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 684.

*vi-vi-p-ar-a, s. pl. [Neut. pl. of Lat. viviparus.] [VIVIPAROUS.]

Zool.: De Blainville's name for the Mammalia (q.v.).

vi-vi-p-a-ri-ty, s. [Eng. vivipar(ous); -ity.] The quality, state, or character of being viviparous. (See extract under OVIPARITY.)

vi-vi-p-a-rou-s, a. [Lat. viviparus, from vivus = alive, and pario = to bring forth.]

1. Ord. Lang. & Zool.: Producing young alive. The term is used in the two following senses:

(1) Of those animals in which the chorion, or external tunic of the ovum, contracts a vascular adhesion to the uterus.

—It is not very easy to conceive a more evidently prospective contrivance than that which, in all viviparous animals, is found in the milk of the female parent.—Paley: Nat. Theol., ch. XIV.

(2) Of those animals the young of which are extricated from their egg-coverings in the oviduct and produced alive.

2. Bot.: Bearing young plants in place of flowers and seeds, as Martia aculeata. There are some viviparous ferns, as Asplenium bulbiferum. [BULBIF, GEMMA.]

viviparous-blenny, s.

Ichthy.: Zoarces viviparus, a species about a foot long, common on the European side of the Atlantic, ranging into the German Ocean and the Baltic. The female produces her young alive, and these are so well developed at their birth that they immediately swim about almost as boldly as the adults. From two to three hundred are produced by one female, and directly before parturition the abdomen is so distended that it is impossible to touch it without causing some of the young to be extruded. [ZOARCES.]

viviparous-fishes, s. pl.

Ichthy.: Fishes, the female of which produce their young alive, as the result of actual congress, the males in most cases being furnished with intromittent organs. Among these are many of the Chondropterygians, the familiae Embiotocidae, many of the Blenniidae and Cyprinodontidae, and several Lophobrancha.

viviparous-larva, s.

Entom.: The larva of the genus Miastor (q.v.).

viviparous-lizard, s.

Zool.: Laecerta vivipara, a British species, from four to six inches long. The colours and markings vary greatly; the general ground tint of the upper parts is a greenish-brown dotted with black; the under surface in the male bright orange spotted with black, in the female pale grayish-green.

vi-vi-p-a-rou-s-ly, adv. [Eng. viviparous; -ly.] In a viviparous manner.

vi-vi-p-a-rou-s-ness, s. [Eng. viviparous; -ness.] The quality, state, or character of being viviparous; viviparity.

vi-vi-për-cép-tion, s. [Lat. vivus = alive, and Eng. perception.] The perception of the processes of vital functions in their natural action. (Opposed to observation by vivisection.) (J. G. Wilkinson.)

*vi-vi-sêct, v.t. [VIVISECTION.] To dissect while still living.

—The great physiologist . . . is represented standing, and at his feet a little rabbit waiting to be vivisected.—St. James's Gazette, Feb. 9, 1885.

vi-vi-sêc-tion, s. [Lat. vivus = alive, and sectio = a cutting, a section (q.v.).]

bill, boy; pout, jowl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

Natural Science:

1. A term denoting, in its strict significance, the dissection of living animals, but popularly employed to denote the practice of performing operations with the knife on living animals, with the view (1) of increasing physiological knowledge; (2) of converting speculative into positive conclusion; and (3) of acquiring manual dexterity in operative surgery. In this last sense vivisection is principally confined to the French veterinary schools. By biologists the term is extended to include the performance of all scientific experiments of a kind calculated to inflict pain upon living animals, and having for their object the investigation of the laws which govern life, the processes of disease, the action of heat and cold, poisons, and therapeutic remedies. The practice appears to have been introduced by the Alexandrian School in the fourth century B.C.; and to this practice we owe, among many other benefits, the discovery of the circulation of the blood by Harvey; the treatment of aneurism by ligature by Hunter; the distinction of the sensory and motor nerves by Bell; the introduction of chloroform; and the improved treatment of cerebral diseases which resulted from the researches of Brown-Sequard and Bernard. It has also been highly valuable in the study of the reproduction of bone, digestion and secretion, the effects of brain excitation, the investigation of parasitic and contagious diseases, the action of poisons, drugs and medicines, and many other matters of importance in connection with modern surgery and medicine. There is much opposition to vivisection, and vivisectors generally admit the necessity of observing the following conditions: (1) That the experimenter should be a skilled anatomist and physiologist; (2) That anaesthetics should be used where possible; and (3) That when a physiological fact has been determined, exhibitions of the experiments by which it was determined are unnecessary and, therefore, unjustifiable. An Anti-vivisection Society was founded in 1875 and another in 1876. [Haydn.]

2. Any painful scientific experiment performed upon a living animal.

"We must conclude that vivisections are not justifiable for the mere instruction of ordinary students."—Westminster Review, Jan., 1856, p. 150.

viv-i-séc-tion-al, a. [Eng. vivisection; -al.] Of or pertaining to vivisection (q.v.).

"It is impossible by vivisectional experiment to know which microscopical elements of the tissues of the animal we destroy."—Westminster Review, Jan., 1856, p. 148.

viv-i-séc-tion-ist, a. [Eng. vivisection; -ist.] One who practises or upholds vivisection; a vivisector.

"Then we are introduced to a certain vivisectionist."—Echo, Sept. 8, 1855.

viv-i-séc-tôr, s. [Lat. vivus = alive, and secor = a cutter.] [SECTOR.] One who practises vivisection.

"It is obviously impossible . . . to yield the required trust in the vivisectors."—Contemporary Review, Feb. 1887, p. 846.

vix-en, s. [The fem. of fox; cf. Ger. füchsin, fem. of fuchs = a fox. This is the only surviving instance of the old English mode of forming the feminine by adding the suff. -en to the masculine.]

1. Lit.: A she-fox.

"These, from their size, are not difficult to overcome, especially if dog and vixen hunt in company."—St. James's Gazette, Feb. 19, 1857.

2. Figuratively:

* (1) An ill-tempered, snarling man.

(2) A turbulent, quarrelsome woman; a termagant, a scold.

"That may be very honourable in you," answered the pertinacious vixen."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

vix-en-ish, a. [Eng. vixen; -ish.] Pertaining to or resembling a vixen; ill-tempered, cross.

"So Tom Smart and his clay-coloured gig with the red wheels, and the vixenish mare with the fast pace, went on together."—Dickens: Pickwick, ch. xiv.

vix-en-ly, a. [Eng. vixen; -ly.] Having the qualities of a vixen; ill-tempered, snappish.

vix, conj. [See def.] A contraction of vixelic (q.v.).

* vi-za-mént, s. [See def.] A corruption of advisement. (Shakesp.: Merry Wives, l. 1.)

* viz-ard, s. [VISOR.]

* viz-ard, v.t. [VIZARD, s.] To mask.

"Degree being vizarded, The unworthing shows as fairly in the mask."—Shakesp.: Troilus & Cressida, l. 2.

* viz-ca'-gha, s. [VISCACHA.]

vi-zî-er', vi-zîr', vi-sî-er', s. [Arab. vazîr = a counsellor of state, minister, vicegerent, orig. = a porter, hence, one who bears the burden of state affairs, from vazara = to bear a burden, to support, to sustain.] The title of a high political officer in the Turkish empire and other Muhammadan states. The title is given in Turkey to the heads of the various ministerial departments into which the divan or ministerial council is divided, and to all pashas of three tails. The prime-minister, or president of the divan, is styled the grand vizier, vizier-azam or sadr-azam. In India vizier was the title of the highest officer at the Mogul court at Delhi; and nawab-vizier ultimately became the hereditary title in the dynasty ruling at Oude.

vi-zî-er'-ate, s. [Eng. vizier; -ate.] The office, state, or authority of a vizier.

vi-zî-er'-i-âl, a. [Eng. vizier; -i-âl.] Of, pertaining to, or issued by a vizier.

viz-ör, s. [VISOR.]

viz-ör, v.t. [VISOR, s.] To cover with or as with a vizor; to mask.

vial-ké vark, s. [Dut.]

Zool.: The name given by the Dutch colonists of South Africa to Phacochærus ethiopicus. [WART-NOSE.]

V-moth, s. [See def.]

Entom.: Halicta vavaria, a rather common British geometra moth, family Macaridæ. Antennæ of the male pectinated, those of the female simple. Wings gray, tinged with a faint iridescence or purple gloss; the fore wings streaked, and having four conspicuous spots, the second one shaped like a V, whence the name. The caterpillar feeds on the goose-berry.

vō-and-zel'-s, s. [From the Malayag name.]

Bot.: A genus of Phaseolæ. Voandzeia subterranea has at last subterranean fruit. It is a native of Africa, but is cultivated also in America for its eatable seeds and legumes.

vōc'-a-ble, s. [Fr. from Lat. vocabulum = an appellation, designation, or name, from voco = to call, from vox, genit. vocis = the voice (q.v.).] A word, a term, a name; specific, a word considered as composed of certain sounds or letters, without regard to its meaning.

"To conjure with the magic vocables 'peace,' 'liberty,' and 'humanity.'"—Daily Telegraph, Oct., 1855.

vō-cāb'-q-lar-ÿ, s. [Fr. vocabulaire, from vocabule = a vocabule (q.v.).]

1. A list or collection of the words of a language, arranged in alphabetical order, and briefly explained; a dictionary, a lexicon, a word-book.

"A vocabulary made after this fashion would with more ease, and in less time, teach the true signification of many terms."—Locke: Human Understanding, bk. III., ch. II.

2. The sum or stock of words used in a language; the range of words employed in a particular profession, trade, or branch of science.

"Their structure and vocabulary have been fully illustrated by Schieffner and F. Müller."—Athenæum, Dec. 29, 1854.

¶ For the difference between vocabulary and dictionary, see DICTIONARY.

* vō-cāb'-q-list, s. [Eng. vocabular(y); -ist.] The writer or compiler of a vocabulary.

vō-cal, * vō-call, a. & s. [Fr. vocal, from Lat. vocalis = sonorous, vocal, from vox, genit. vocis = the voice.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of or pertaining to the voice or speech; uttered or delivered with the voice.

"The bells of Bylestone seemed to say. . . With vocal music, 'God vs ayus!'"—White Doe, vil. Wordsworth.

2. Having a voice; endowed with, or as if with a voice.

II. Technically:

1. Phonetics:

(1) Uttered with voice, as distinct from breath; voiced, sonant. (Said of certain letters, as s as distinguished from z, or v as distinguished from f.) [VOICE, s., II. 4.]

(2) Having a vowel character; vowel.

2. Music:

(1) For or by the voice. (Only applied to music intended to be sung.)

(2) Applied to compositions so written as to be easy and effective for the voice.

(3) Applied to the singing quality of tone obtained from an instrument.

B. As substantive:

Roman Church: A man who has a right to vote in certain elections.

vocal-chords, vocal-cords, s. pl.

Anat.: The inferior thyro-arytenoid ligaments; elastic membranes, the edges of which form the aide of the glottis. They are attached in front to the thyroid cartilage, and end behind in a process of the arytenoid cartilages. They nearly close the aperture of the wind-pipe. (For the use of the vocal chords see VOICE, s., II. 1.) In addition to them there are upper or false vocal chords, which are not immediately concerned in the production of the voice. [VOICE, s., II. 1.] vocal-tube, s.

Anat.: The part of the air-passages above the inferior ligaments of the larynx, including the passages through the mouth and nostrils. (Dunglison.) vō-cāl'-ic, a. [Eng. vocal; -ic.] Relating, pertaining to, or consisting of vowel sounds.

"Take the word few, in which it has only a vocalic sound."—Earle: Philology of English Language, § 129.

vō-cal-ÿsm, s. [Eng. vocal; -ism.]

1. The exercise of the vocal organs; vocalization.

"There is one dialect of our family which is distinguished for such a vocalism, and that is Missogothic."—Earle: Philology of English Tongue, § 109.

vōgue, *vois, *voyce, *voys, s. [O. Fr. vois (Fr. voix) = a voice, sound, from Lat. vocem, accus. of vox = the voice; cf. Sans. vac to speak; vacas = speech.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The sound uttered by the mouths of living creatures, whether men or the lower animals; especially, human utterances in speaking, singing, or otherwise; the sound made when a person speaks or sings.

"Within each distance a voice may reach." Couper: Homer; Udyseye xii.

2. A particular mode or character of speaking or of sounds uttered: as, a loud voice, a low voice.

3. The faculty or power of speaking or singing; speech: as, To lose one's voice.

4. A sound produced by an inanimate object, and regarded as representing the voice of an intelligent being; sound emitted: as, the voice of a trumpet.

5. Anything analogous to human speech, which conveys impressions to any of the senses.

"Unworthy be the voice of Fame to hear. That sweetest music to an honest ear." Pope: Horace, sat. ii.

6. A word, a term, a vocable.

7. Language, words, speech.

"No man could know His speche ne his vois, though men it herd." Chaucer: C. T., l. 874.

8. That which is said or spoken; talk, report.

"The common voice, I see, is verified Of thee." Shakspeare: Henry VIII., v. 2.

9. Opinion expressed; judgment.

"The voice of Christendom." Shakspeare: Henry VIII., ii. 2.

10. The right of expressing an opinion of judgment; a vote, a suffrage.

"The one thing which the laborer wants is a voice in the management of the workhouse."—Echo, April 21, 1888.

11. A wish, order, or injunction expressed or made known in any way; a command, a precept.

"Ye would not be obedient to the voice of the Lord your God."—Deut. viii. 20.

12. One who speaks; a speaker.

"A potent voice of Parliament." Tennyson: In Memoriam, cxlii.

II. Technically:

1. Physiol.: A sound emitted from the larynx (q.v.), which is the organ of voice. To produce it a blast of air, driven by a more or less prolonged expiratory movement, throws the vocal cords (q.v.) into vibration, they again imparting their vibrations to the column of air above them. When a note is to be uttered the vocal cords become parallel to each other, and thus more easily vibrate by a moderate blast of air. The true vocal cords and the parts of the larynx which affect them constitute the essential vocal apparatus, whilst the parts above—viz., the ventricles of the larynx with the false vocal cords, the pharynx, and the cavity of the mouth—constitute a resonance tube. In a voice are to be distinguished loudness and pitch, the former dependent on the strength of the expiratory blast, the latter on the length and degree of tension of the vocal cord. The shrill voice of a child arises from the shortness of its cords in infancy; soprano, tenor, and baritone voices also depend respectively on the length of the cords, those of a man being about one-third longer than those of a woman or of a boy. The breaking of the voice at puberty arises from the rapid development of the larynx.

2. Gram.: That form of the verb or body of inflections which shows the relation of the subject of the affirmation or predication to the action expressed by the verb. In English and many other languages there are two voices—active and passive (see these words); in Greek and some other languages there is a third voice—the middle (q.v.).

3. Music: Voices may be arranged in six orders or classes, according to gravity or acuteness, viz., the bass, barytone, tenor, alto, or contralto, mezzo-soprano, and soprano (see these words). The first three are the natural voices of men, and the second three those of women. The compass or range of notes is different in each voice, but it is not compass alone which determines the class to which any voice may belong, as very frequently a barytone quality of voice is limited to the range of a bass, and a tenor quality to the compass of a barytone.

4. Phonetics: Sound uttered with resonance of the vocal chords, and not with a mere emission of breath; sonant utterance.

¶ (1) In my voice: In my name. (Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, l. 3.)

(2) With one voice: Unanimously.

"The Orekish heads, with one voice, Call Agamemnon head and general."
Shakesp.: Troilus & Cressida, l. 2.

The difficulties of pronunciation are obviated by making each letter have only one sound, and words are always written as they are pronounced, and pronounced as they are written. The alphabet consists of twenty-seven letters, eight being vowels and nineteen consonants. The consonants are sounded as in English, with the exception of ch, which always has the sound of ch as in child; j, which always has the sound of sh, as in shide; and g, which is always hard; h is used as an aspirate. The accent is invariably on the last syllable, and to the simple French construction is added the advantage of only one conjugation, and there are no irregular verbs or artificial genders. The method of derivation is always the same. The adjectives, verbs, and adverbs being regularly formed from the substantive and analogous in termination, a knowledge of all the nouns practically means the acquirement of the language. W becomes v, and, for the benefit of eastern peoples to whom the pronunciation of r is always a stumbling-block, l is generally substituted for it. The words are generally reduced to one syllable: thus fat = father, dol (Lat. dolor) = pain, gan (Ger. gan) = goose. Nouns have but one declension and only four cases; gender is indicated by the prefix of; thus, tüel = schoolmaster, of-tüel = schoolmistress.

Adjectives are formed by adding ik to the substantives, and adverbs by adding o to the adjectives: thus, fam = glory, famik = glorious, famiko = gloriously.

völ-g-pük-ist, s. [Eng. Volapük: -ist.] An advocate of the adoption of Volapük as a universal language.

Volapük was at first very popular, there being many thousands of students, numerous dictionaries and grammars, over 20 newspapers printed in it, and associations for its practice and extension in most civilized lands. This progress has since been checked, the feeling being that Volapük does not fill the requirements of a world language.

völ-lär, a. [Lat. volvo = the palm of the hand.] Anat.: Of or belonging to the palm of the hand: as, the volar artery.

völ-lär-ý, s. [VOLERY.] A bird-cage, large enough for birds to fly about in.

"And now sits penitent and solitary, Like the forsaken turtle in the volary."—Ben Jonson: New Inn, v. 1.

völ-g-tile, a. & s. [Fr. volatil, from Lat. volatilis, from volatus = flight, from volvo = to fly; Sp. & Port. volátil; Ital. volatile.]

- A. As adjective:
1. Passing through the air on wings; flying. "There is no creature only volatile, or no flying animal but hath feet as well as wings."—Bag: On the Creation.
 2. Having the quality of evaporating or of passing off by spontaneous evaporation; diffusing more or less freely in the atmosphere, as alcohol, ether, essential oils, &c.
 3. Lively, sprightly, brisk, gay; hence, fickle, apt to change; thoughtless, giddy. "Gay, volatile, ingenious, quick to learn."—Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. VI.

B. As subst.: Not permanent; not lasting. "Volatile and fugitive instances of repentance."—Ep. Taylor: Of Repentance, ch. v., § 6.

B. As subst.: A winged creature. "Ferre foudit beestis and craping beestis and volatilis of heuene."—Wycliffe: Deals xl.

volatile-liquids, s. pl. [LIQUID, s. I. 1. ¶.]

volatile-oils, s. pl. Chem.: Essential oils; oils which can be distilled without decomposition. They are classed under two heads: mineral and vegetable; the former being composed of carbon and hydrogen, and generically known as paraffins. The vegetable oils, which are generally procured by distilling the odoriferous substance with water, may be divided into three great classes: (1) Oils composed of carbon and hydrogen (binary volatile oils), of which oil of turpentine may be considered the type; (2) oils containing carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen (oxygenated oils), which include most of those used in medicine and perfumery; and (3) oils containing sulphur (sulphuretted oils), characterized by their extreme pungency and suffocating odour, such as oil of mustard, assafoetida, &c. The volatile oils are generally more limpid and less unctuous than the fixed oils, and are almost colourless after rectification. They are soluble in alcohol and ether, slightly soluble in water, and mix in all proportions with the fixed oils.

völ-g-tile-näss, s. [Eng. volatile: -ness.] The quality or state of being volatile; volatility.

"The animal spirits cannot, by reason of their subtilty and volatility, be discovered to the sense."—Hale.

völ-g-til-i-tý, s. [Fr. volatilité, from volatil = volatile (q.v.).]

1. The quality or state of being volatile; disposition to evaporate; that quality of a substance which disposes it to diffuse itself more or less rapidly in the atmosphere; capability of diffusing, evaporating, or dissipating at ordinary atmospheric temperatures. "That pure, elaborated oil, which by reason of its extreme volatility, exhales spontaneously."—Arbutnot.
2. The quality or state of being volatile, flighty, giddy, or fickle; flightiness, thoughtlessness; light or thoughtless behaviour.

völ-a-til-iz-g-ble, a. [Eng. volatilize: -able.] Capable of being volatilized.

völ-g-til-i-zä-tion, a. [Eng. volatilize:]

-ation. The act or process of volatilizing or rendering volatile; the state of being volatilized.

"The volatilization of the salt of tartar."—Boyle: Works, II. 122.

völ-g-til-ise, v.t. [Eng. volatilize: -ise.] To render volatile; to cause to exhale, evaporate, or pass off in vapour or invisible effluvia, and to rise and float in the air.

"Many learned men . . . do not think it credible that at least corporal gold should be volatilized by quicksilver."—Boyle: Works, I. 242.

völ-an-vent (as völ-ö-vän), s. [Fr. = a puff of wind.]

Cook.: A raised pie made with a case of very light and rich puff paste; a kind of enlarged and highly-ornamented patty.

völ-börth-ite, s. [After Dr. A. Volborth; suff. -ite (Mün.)]

Mün.: A mineral occurring in small tabular crystals on a sandstone of the Permian formation in the Urals. Crystallization, hexagonal; hardness, 3 to 3.5; sp. gr. 3.55; lustre, pearly; colour, olive-green, citron-yellow; streak, yellowish-green. Analyses made by Genth gave results which justified the following formula: (Cu, Ba, Ca)₂V₂O₆ + 3CuH₂O₂ + 12aq, which requires, vanadic acid, 19.63; protoxide of copper, 38.41; baryta, 6.17; lime, 6.77; water, 29.02 = 100.

völ-cä-ni-an, a. [Eng. volcano (o). -ian.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling a volcano; volcanic.

"A deep volcanic yellow."—Keats: Lamia.

völ-cän-ic, a. [Fr. volcanique.] Pertaining to a volcano; proceeding from or produced by a volcano; resembling a volcano.

"Its situation is romantic, at the foot of a volcanic mountain."—Field, Feb. 4, 1828.

volcanic-action, s. Geol.: The influence exerted by the heated interior of the earth on its external covering. [LYELL.] [VULCANISM.]

volcanic-ash, s. Petrol.: An ash-like substance derived from the action of volcanic scoria by the explosion of steam and gases in volcanic craters. The induced volcanic ashes of early geological periods have had a similar origin.

volcanic-bomb, s. Petrol.: A name given to semi-fused, rounded masses of rocks, of various mineral composition, sometimes ejected during volcanic eruptions. [BOMB, II. 2.]

volcanic-breccia, s. Petrol.: A breccia formed by the consolidation of angular fragments of volcanic rocks. [LYELL.]

volcanic-dike, s. [DIKE, s. II. 1.]

volcanic-foot, s. pl. Geol.: The subterranean centres of action in volcanoes, where the heat is supposed to be in the highest degree of energy. [LYELL.]

volcanic-glass, s. Petrol.: The same as OBESIDIAN (q.v.).

volcanic-mud, s. [MOVA.]

volcanic-regions, s. pl. Geol. & Geog.: Certain regions of the world throughout which volcanic and earthquake action specially prevails. They run in lines. The region of the Andes extends from lat. 43° South to 2° North; that of Mexico follows, then that of the West Indies. Another extends from the Aleutian Islands to the Moluccas and the Isles of Sunda, another from Central Asia to the Canary Islands and the Azores. There is one in the Grecian Archipelago, having its chief focus at Santorin, known to have been active at intervals for two thousand years; then that of Italy and Sicily, having vents in Etna, Vesuvius, and Ischia. One region is in Iceland, with Hecla as its chief vent. Volcanoes are generally near the sea. Jorillo, in Mexico, is, however, an exception, being 120 miles from the nearest ocean.

volcanic-rocks, s. pl. Geol.: Rocks which have been produced at or near the surface of the earth in ancient or modern times by the action of subterranean heat, by water, and pressure. [LYELL.] They form one of the leading divisions of rocks, and resemble Plutonic rocks (q.v.) in being generally unstratified and destitute of fossils, but are distinguished from them. Volcanic are more partially distributed than aqueous rocks. Old volcanic rocks are so nearly identical with the products of modern volcanoes, that the two were undoubtedly produced in a similar manner. The leading volcanic rocks are basalt, andesite, and trachyte.

Geol.: Sand ejected from a crater. It differs from ash in having a coarser grain. The puzzolana of Naples is volcanic-sand.

volcanic-soil, s. Soil largely consisting of the decomposed products of eruption. It is well adapted for wine-growing.

völ-cän-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. volcanic; -al, -ly.] Like a volcano.

völ-can-ic-ly, s. [Eng. volcanic; -ity.] The quality or state of being volcanic; volcanic power.

völ-can-ism, s. [Eng. volcan(o); -ism.] Volcanicity.

völ-can-ist, s. [Eng. volcan(o); -ist.] 1. One versed in the history and phenomena of volcanoes. 2. A volcanist (q.v.).

völ-can-ite (1), s. [Eng. volcan(o); suff. -ite (Min.).] Min.: The same as PYROXENE (q.v.).

völ-can-ite (2), s. [After the island Volcano, where first found; suff. -ite (Min.).] Min.: A variety of sulphur containing selenium, found in stalactitic forms and as an encrustation. Colour, orange or brownish.

völ-cän-ly-ty, s. [Eng. volcanic(o); -ity.] The quality or state of being volcanic, or of volcanic origin.

völ-can-i-zä-tion, s. [Eng. volcaniz(e); -ation.] The act or power of volcanizing; the state of being volcanized.

völ-can-ize, v.t. [Eng. volcan(o); -ize.] To subject to, or cause to undergo volcanic heat and be affected by its action.

völ-cä-nö, s. [Ital. vulcano, vulcano, from Lat. Vulcanus, Vulcanus [VULCAN]; Sp. & Fr. volcan.]

1. Geol.: A more or less perfectly conical hill or mountain formed by the successive accumulations of ejected matter in a state of incandescence or high heat, and having one or more channels of communication. (Lyell.) Volcanoes are of three kinds: Active, Dormant, and Extinct. An active volcano is one which still continues at intervals to break into eruptions. A dormant volcano is one which after being quiescent for a long interval, as if its fires were extinct, then breaks forth anew. An extinct volcano is one not known to have been in eruption since man has been upon the earth. The connection between earthquakes and volcanoes is so close that intense seismic action occurs only in the regions where volcanoes exist. [VOLCANIC REGIONS.] Earthquakes often precede volcanic eruptions, and become less violent when the volcano in the vicinity breaks forth, as if the explosive material struggling to obtain room for expansion produced the earthquake, and found vent in the volcano. Thus a volcano is a natural safety-valve, and saves vastly more human lives than it destroys. The following is the hypothetical genesis of a volcano. Some seismic convulsion produces a deep fissure in the ground, communicating beneath with a lake of molten matter. From this aperture lava flows forth, showers of scoriae or ashes, dust, and sand are hurled into the air, boiling water rises in enormous jets, steam and various gasses ascend. Certain of these materials, such as the ashes, the sand, and the dust falling around the aperture, form a tiny eminence, the sides of which slope at the highest angle at which falling material can rest without aliding to the bottom. By this process repeated an indefinite number of times a hill tends to arise of a conical form, and the fissure, whatever its original form, to become a round crater. The first flow of lava from a fissure on a plain would be nearly horizontal, but, as there across a volcanic cone of material which, though loose at first would tend to cohere, it would descend the slope at an angle. Earthquakes continually upheave regions or districts, and might aid in raising the small volcano to a higher elevation above the sea. Similar action might in certain cases produce what has been called "craters of elevation," but those of eruption are far more numerous. Then when the volcano becomes elevated the pressure of the lava is so great as to break through the sides of the crater, and allow the molten mass to escape by a fresh aperture, around which a minor cone is produced. Eighty such minor cones are known on the flank of Etna. The top of a volcano may also fall in and disappear. A small volcano may arise in a night, as did Monte Nuovo 450 feet high, in the Phlegrean fields near Naples, in 1538, but an immense lapse of time is needful to build up such a mountain as Etna (height 10,874 feet) or Cotopaxi (18,858 feet). About three hundred active volcanoes are known. Besides these there are submarinus volcanoes, which occasionally come to the surface of the sea, as did Graham's Island, in the Mediterranean near Sicily, in 1831. Volcanoes have existed in all bygone geological ages. Arthur's Seat, near Edinburgh, is an old volcano, its summit being formed by lava formerly filling the hollow of the crater, but from which the softer material of the cone has in some submergence been washed away.

2. Astron.: There are numerous and large extinct volcanoes in the moon (q.v.).

völ-cä-nö-ism, s. [Eng. volcan(o); -ism.] Eruptiveness. "Blaze out, as wasteful volcanism to scorch and consume."—Carlyle: Past & Present, bk. ii., ch. x.

völe (1), s. [Fr., from voler (Lat. volo) = to fly, to dart upon, as a bird of prey.] A deal at cards that draws all the tricks.

"And at backgammon mortally my soul That pants for loss, or butlers in a volé."—Colman's Epilogue to School for Scandal.

völe (2), s. [Etym. doubtful; perhaps a corruption of völd = field, plain, and hence = field-mouse.] Zool.: A popular name for any species of the Arvicoline, a sub-family of Muridae, with three genera—Arvicola, Fiber, and Myodes. They are mouse or rat-like rodents of a rather stout build, with the limbs and tail of moderate length, or short, and the latter more hairy than in the true Murines; the ears are short, often nearly concealed beneath the fur. [WATER-VÖLE.] Several species range over Central Europe and into Western Asia, but the voles are most abundant (both as species and individuals) in the northern and north-western parts of North America. (For the British species see Arvicola.)

völe, v.t. [VÖLE (1), s.] Cards: To win all the tricks by a vole.

vö-leé, s. [Fr. = a flight, from voler = to fly.] Music: A rapid flight or succession of notes.

vö-lent-ly, adv. [Lat. volens, pr. par. of volo = to wish.] Willingly.

"Ran so volently, so volently to the brink of it"—Adams: Works, 1, 237.

vö-lër-ý, s. [Fr. volière = an aviary, a pigeon-house, from voler = to fly.] 1. A large bird-cage in which birds have room to fly; a volary. 2. A flight of birds.

"An old boy at his first appearance . . . is sure to draw on him the eyes and chirping of the whole town volery."—Locke: Of Education, § 94.

völ-ét (t allent), s. [Fr., from voler = to fly.] 1. Ord. Lang.: A gauze veil worn by ladies at the back of the head in the Middle Ages.

2. Paint.: A term applied to the wings or shutters of a picture, forming a triptych.

völge, s. [Lat. vulgus.] [VULGAR.] The vulgar; the mob. "We must speak with the volge, and think with the wise."—Fuller: Worthies; London.

völ-gër-ite, s. [After G. H. O. Volger; suff. -ite (Min.).] Min.: An oxide of antimony occurring massive or pulverulent. Colour, white. Compos.: oxygen, 19.3; antimony, 58.9; water, 21.8 = 100, with the formula SbO₃ + 5H₂O.

völ-ít-a-ble, a. [Eng. volat(ile); -able.] Capable of being volatilized. "This voltable spirit is soon spent."—Hopkins: Sermons; John III. 4.

völ-ý-tä-tion, s. [Lat. volito, freq. from volo = to fly.] The act or state of flying; flight. "Birds or flying animals are . . . only prone in the act of volitation."—Brown: Vulgar Errors, bk. iv., ch. 1.

völ-ý-tient (tiashsh), a. [VOLITION.] Having power to will; exercising the will; willing. "What I do I do volittent, not obedient."—K. B. Browning: Drama of Exile.

völ-ý-tion, s. [Fr., from a supposed Low Lat. volitionem, accus. of volitio, from Lat. volo = to wish.]

1. The act of willing; the exercise of the will; the act of determining choice or of forming a purpose.

"The actual exercise of that power, by directing any particular action, or its forbearance is that which we call volition, or willing."—Locke: Human Understanding, bk. ii., ch. xxi.

2. The power of willing; will.

völ-ý-tion-al, a. [Eng. volition; -al.] Pertaining or relating to volition.

völ-ý-tive, a. [VOLITION.]

I. Ordinary Language: 1. Having the power to will; exercising volition. "They do not only perfect the intellectual faculty, but they also perfect the volitive faculty."—Hale: Orig. of Mankind, p. 6. 2. Originating in the will. II. Gram.: Used in expressing a wish or permission: as, a volitive proposition.

† völ-ý-tör-és, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. volito = to fly to and fro, to flutter.]

Ornith.: In Owen's classification an order of Birds moving solely by flight; skeleton light and highly pneumatic; sternum with a simple manubrium, in most with two notches on each side; intestinal caeca usually absent or large, wings powerful, in some long and pointed; legs small and weak. They are monogamous, and nest in holes of trees or in the earth; head large, gape wide; food taken on the wing. The order includes Owen's families:—Cypselidae, Trochilidae, Caprimulgidae, Trogonidae, Promiidae, Meropidae, Galbulidae, Coraciidae, Capitonidae, Alcedinidae, and Bucconidae.

völ-ka-mër-ý-a, s. [Named after John G. Volkämer, a German botanist, who published a flora of Nuremberg in 1700.]

Bot.: A genus of Vitaceae (q.v.). Akin to Clerodendron, but having fleshy or corky fruit with two stones, each two-celled. Known species two, one from tropical America, the other from Nubia. Both have white flowers in cymes.

völk-män-ný-a, s. [Named after Volkman, its discoverer.]

Palaeobot.: A genus of Equisetaceae, from the Coal Measures. They have verticillate leaves, and at their extremities cones, and are supposed to be Asterophyllites in fructification.

volks-lied (pron. folks'-lit), s. A folk-song; specific, a German popular song.

völ-loý, *völ-ly, s. [Fr. volée = a flight, a volley, a flight of birds, from Lat. volata, fem. of volatus, pa. par. of volo = to fly; Ital. volata = a flight, a volley.]

1. A flight of missiles, as of shot, arrows, &c.; a simultaneous discharge of a number of missiles, as small-arms.

"Welcomed one another with a thundering volley of shot."—Hackluyt: Voyages, iii. 82.

fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wë, wët, hère, camel, hër, thère; pine, pít, síre, sír, marine; gò, pòt, or, wóre, wöf, wörk, whò, sòn; müte, cüb, cüre, uníte, cür, rüle, füll; try, Sýrian. æ, œ = ö; ey = ä; qu = kw.

2. A noisy or explosive burst or emission of many things at once.

"He wore an iron-hearted fellow, in my judgment, that would not credit him upon this volley of oaths."

3. (In Tennis & other Ball Games): A return of the ball before it touches the ground. A return immediately after the ball has touched the ground is called a Half-volley.

¶ (1) Half-volley: [VOLLEY, s., 3.]
¶ (2) On the volley: At random.

vōl'-lōy, v.t. & t. [VOLLEY, s.]

A. Trans.: To discharge in, or as in a volley.

"He strove, with volleyed throat and ban."

B. Intransitive:

1. To discharge at once, or in a volley.

"Canon to right of them . . ."

2. To sound like a volley of artillery.

3. (In Tennis, &c.): To return a ball before it touches the ground. [VOLLEY, s., 3.]

vōl-ow, v.t. [A.S. fulwian.] To baptize.

vōlt (1), s. [Fr. volte, from Lat. voluta, fem. of volutus, pa. par. of volvo = to turn. [VAULT, s.]

1. Manège: A round or a circular tread; a gait of two treads, made by a horse going sideways round a centre, so that these two treads make parallel tracks—the one which is made by the fore feet larger, and the other by the hinder feet smaller—the shoulders bearing outwards, and the crop approaching towards the centre. [Farrier's Dict.] [DEMI-VOLT.]

2. Fencing: A sudden movement or leap to avoid a thrust.

vōlt (2), s. [Named in honour of Alessandro Volta.] [VOLTAIC.]

Elect.: The unit which expresses difference of potential. An electrical current is in many respects analogous to a flow of water. The fundamental unit (UNITS, ¶ 4.) is one of mere quantity, the Coulomb, and merely expresses sufficient current to do a certain amount of work. But the same quantity of water would flow through a large pipe at one inch per second, and through one half the diameter at four inches per second. Hence we get the unit expressing quantity per second (the ampère); and thirdly, as a greater pressure or force is required to drive water at a given rate per second through a small pipe, or greater resistance, so as to maintain a given quantity per second, in electrical currents we have this force or pressure, considered as the difference of potential or electrical pressure at the two ends of the circuit of wire. The resistance of a wire to the passage of a current is measured in ohms (units), and a volt is the difference of potential required to drive an effective current of one ampère through a wire interposing the resistance of one ohm.

vōlt-tā (pl. vōlt'-tō), s. [Ital. = a torn, from Lat. voluta.] [VOLT (1).]

Musical: A direction that the part is to be repeated one, two, or more times; as, Una volta = one repeat; due volte = two repeats.

vōlt-tā, pref. [See def.] Voltaic (q.v.).

† volta-electric, a. Galvanic; pertaining to or produced by galvanism (q.v.).

volta-electrometer, s. [VOLTMETER.]

vōlt'-āge, s.

Elect.: Motive force as expressed or measured in volts.

vōl-tāg'-rā-phŷ, s. [Eng. volta, and Gr. γράφω (graphō) = to write, to draw.] The art of electrotypy.

vōlt-tā-ic, a. [See def.] Of or pertaining to Alessandro Volta, an Italian physician (1745-1820). [VOLTAIC.]

voltaic-pile, s. [PILE (1), s., II. I. (1).]

† vōlt-tāir'-ism, † Vōlt-tāire'-ism, s. [See def.] The principles or practices of François-Marie Aronét (1694-1778), better known as Voltaire. He was a bitter opponent of Christianity, which he assailed with merciless ridicule; hence the word has come to mean any kind of mocking scepticism.

vōlt-tā-ism, s. [See def.]

Physics: A term sometimes applied to Galvaniem (q.v.), from the fact that Volta's explanations of Galvan's experiments on frogs led to the correct appreciation of the source of the electricity so generated.

vōlt-tā-ite, s. [After the eminent physicist A. Volta; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An isometric mineral occurring in octahedrons, cubes, and other forms, at the Solofata, near Naples. Lustre, resinous; colour, dull green to brown or black; streak, grayish-green; opaque. Compos.: a hydrated sulphate of sesqui- and protoxide of iron, with the formula, Fe₂O₃SO₃ + 24HO.

vōlt-tām'-ē-tēr, s. [Prof. volta, and Eng. meter.]

Elect.: An instrument for measuring the work, and thus indirectly the strength, of a voltaic current. This is done by the amount of electro-chemical decomposition, a certain current reducing a certain amount of hydrogen from water, silver or copper from their salts, &c. This must not be confounded with Voltmeter (q.v.).

vōlt-tā-plāst, s. [Prof. volta, and Gr. πλαστικός (plastós) = moulded, from πλάσσω (plássō) = to mould.] A voltaic battery specifically adapted for the electrotyping process.

vōlt-tā-tŷpe, s. [Prof. volta, and Eng. type.] An electrotype (q.v.).

vōlt-tŷ, v.t. [Ital. Imper. of voltare = to turn.] [VOLT (1).]

Musical: A direction to turn over the leaf: as, Volti subito = turn over the leaf quickly.

vōlt-tŷ-gōur (g as zh), s. [Fr., from voltiger = to vault (q.v.).]

1. A leaper, a vaulter, a tumbler.

2. A foot-soldier in a select company of every regiment of French infantry. They were established by Napoleon during his consulate. Their duties, exercises, and equipment are similar to those of the English light companies.

vōlt-mē-tēr, s. [Eng. volt (2), and meter.]

Elect.: Any instrument for measuring the pressure, electromotive force, or difference of potentials at the ends of an electric current. The gold-leaf electro-scope is a kind of voltmeter, but will only measure large differences of potential. If the terminals are connected with flat plates arranged parallel to each other, one of which is movable, the attractive force between the plates at a given small distance will be a voltmeter. This method is too coarse for ordinary currents, but a modification of it is employed in Thomson's quadrant electrometer. In Cardew's voltmeter the heating effect of the current in a wire, which varies with the electromotive force, and is measured by the expansion produced, is employed. In the majority of instruments the electro-magnetic action is employed in some form of galvanometer. These are more usually found to act as ammeters, but if wound with very thin wire the high resistance allows the electromotive force required to drive a certain current through them to be calibrated and denoted in volts. Such instruments are adjusted or calibrated by comparison with a "standard" voltaic cell or voltameter.

vōlt'-zŷ-ā, s. [Named after Voltz, of Strasbourg.]

Palaeobot.: A genus of Conifera, consisting of lofty trees with pinnated branches, having on all sides sessile leaves, in form and imbrication like those of Araucaria. It has also affinities to the Cypress. Found in the Permian and the Trias of Britain and Germany.

vōltz'-ine, vōltz'-ite, s. [After the French mining engineer Voltz; suff. -ine, -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring in mammillary groups of globules, having a concentric lamellar structure, optically uniaxial. Hardness, 4 to 4.5; sp. gr. 3.66 to 3.81; lustre, greasy, sometimes pearly on a cleavage surface; colour, yellowish, brownish. Compos.: an oxysulphide of zinc, with the formula 4ZnS + ZnO, which represents; sulphide of zinc, 82.73; protoxide of zinc, 17.27 = 100.

vōl-lū'-bŷ-late, vōl-lū'-bŷle, a. [VOLUBLE.]

Bot.: Twining, voluble.

vōl-lū'-bŷl-i-tŷ, vōl-lū'-bŷl-i-tŷle, s. [Fr. volubilité, from Lat. volubilitatem, accus. of volubilitas, from volubilis = voluble (q.v.).]

1. A rolling or revolving; aptness to roll or revolve; revolution.

"The world with continual volubilitas and turning about."—P. Holland: Pinnis, bk. II.

2. Liability to revolution or change; mutability.

"And this volubility of human affairs is the judgment of Providence, in the punishment of oppression."—Z. Ettrange.

3. The quality or state of being voluble in speech; over-great readiness of the tongue in speaking; excessive fluency of speech; garrulosity.

"The sheemless volubility with which he uttered falsehoods."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. VI.

vōl-lū'-ble, a. [Fr. = easily turned or rolled, fickle, glib, from Lat. volubilem, accus. of volubilis = easily turned about, from volutus, pa. par. of volvo = to turn, to roll; Sp. voluble; Ital. volubile.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Formed so as to roll or revolve easily; apt to roll or revolve; rotating.

"This less voluble earth."—Milton: P. L., IV. 594.

2. Changeable, fickle, mutable.

"Almost puts Faith in a fever, and defies alone Voluble chance."—Two Noble Kinsmen, I. 2.

3. Of fluent speech, without conveying the imputation that there was a deficiency of thought in what was said.

"He [Archbishop Abbot] was painful, stout, severe against bad manners, of a grave and voluble eloquence."—Huckel: Life of Williams, pt. I., p. 66.

4. Characterized by an excessive flow of words, or by glibness of speech; speaking with over-great fluency; glib.

"An old Communist here interrupted the voluble fury."—Daily Telegraph, Sept. 10, 1885.

II. Bot.: Twining (q.v.).

vōl-lū'-ble-ness, s. [Eng. voluble; -ness.] The quality or state of being voluble; volubility.

vōl-lū'-blŷ, adv. [Eng. voluble(-ly).] In a voluble or over-fluent manner; with volubility.

vōl-lū'-çŷl-lā, s. [Dimin. from Lat. volucur = flying, winged.]

Entom.: A genus of Syrphidae, akin to Syrphus, but stouter and less gaily coloured. The larvae are wrinkled, and have on each side a double row of short spines, while at the extremity are four to six longer spines arranged in a radiated manner. Beneath are six pairs of tubercles with claws, which serve as prolegs. They reside in the nests of bumble bees, on the young of which they feed. The perfect insect resembles a Bombus. This is especially the case with a British species, Volucella bombylans, which is about half an inch long, black, and hairy.

vōl-lū'-me, s. [Fr., from Lat. volumen = a roll, a scroll; hence, a book written on a parchment roll; from the same root as volutus, pa. par. of volvo = to roll; Sp. volumen; Ital. & Port. volume.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Something rolled or convolved; a convolution, a coil, a fold, a wreath, a roll, as a fold of a serpent, or the like.

"Th' Inachians view the slain with vast surprise, Her twisting volumes, and her rolling eyes."—Pope: Statius: Thebaid, l. 728.

2. Specially, a written document (as of parchment, papyrus, &c.), rolled up in a convenient form for preservation or use; a roll, a scroll. The books of the ancients were rolls wound round a stick, called an umbilicus, to the extremities of which, called the cornua (or horns) was attached a label bearing the name of the author, &c. The whole was placed in a wrapper, and generally anointed with oil of cedar-wood to protect it from the attacks of insects.

3. Hence, applied to a collection of printed sheets bound together, whether containing a single complete work, part of a work, or more than one work; a book, a tome. In a narrower sense, that part of an extended work which is bound together in one cover: as, a book in three volumes.

"The miscreant bishop of Spalatto wore learned volumes against the pope."—Milton: Annals upon Remonstrant's Defence. (Postscript.)

4. The space occupied by a body; dimensions in length, breadth, and depth; compass, mass, bulk.

5. (Pl.): A great deal. (Chiefly in the phrase, To speak volumes = that says a great deal, that is full of meaning.)

"There! 'And there!' as he faced about, and pointed his hand, told what writers are apt to term volumes."—Aclo, Jan. 4, 1887.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: The volume of an irregular body may be found from its weight and specific gravity; that is to say, the weight of a unit volume. If w be the weight of the body in grammes, and s its specific gravity, the fraction $\frac{w}{s}$ gives its volume in cubic centimetres. The capacities of vessels are determined by filling them with water or mercury from a measuring-tube, or other vessel whose capacity is previously known; or, when very great accuracy is required, by determining the weight of water or mercury, at the standard temperature, which fills the vessel. (Hatts.)

2. Music: A term applied to the power and quality of the tone of a voice or instrument, or of a combination of sounds.

3. Physics: The volume of a body may be real or apparent; the former is the portion of space actually occupied by the matter of which the body is composed, the latter is the sum of its real volume and the total volume of its pores. The real volume is invariable, the apparent volume can be altered in various ways; for instance, it diminishes as a rule on the solidification of the body. (Gannol.)

¶ (1) Atomic volume: [ATOMIC.]

(2) Unit of volume: The volume of the cube constructed on the unit of length. (Everett: The C. G. S. System of Units, p. 1.)

vól-úme, v. i. [VOLUME, s.] To swell; to rise in bulk or volume.

"The mighty steam which volumes high
From their proud nostrils burns the very air."
Byron: The Deformed Transformed, l. 2.

vól-úmcá, a. [Eng. volume(s.); -ad.]

1. Having the form of a rounded mass; in volumes; forming volumes or rounded masses; consisting of moving or rolling masses.

"With voluted smoke that slowly grew To one white sky of sulphurous hue."
Byron: Siege of Corinth, vii.

2. Consisting of so many volumes. (Used in composition: as, a three-volume novel, &c.)

vól-ú-mén-óm'-ě-ter, vól-ú-móm'-ě-ter, s. [Lat. volume = a volume, and Eng. meter.] An instrument for measuring the volume of a solid body by the quantity of a liquid or of the air which it displaces, and thence also for determining its specific gravity. A very simple volumometer consists of a globular flask with a narrow neck, about twelve inches long, and graduated from below upwards to indicate grains of water. The flask has a tubulure, accurately fitted with a ground stopper for admitting the solid body to be measured. The instrument being filled to the mark o on the neck with a liquid, as water, which does not act upon the solid, it is inclined on one side, the stopper removed, and the solid body introduced. The stopper is then replaced, and the number of divisions through which the liquid is raised in the stem gives at once the volume of the body in grain-measure.

vól-ú-mén-óm'-ě-trý, s. [Eng. volumometer; -y.] The act or art of determining the volumes or space occupied by bodies; applied generally, however, only to solid bodies; stereometry.

vól-ú-měť-ric, a. [Eng. volume, and metric.]

Chem.: Pertaining to or performed by measured volumes of standard solutions of reagents.

volumetric-analysis, s. [ANALYSIS.]

vól-ú-měť-ric-al-ly, adv. [Eng. volumetric; -al; -ly.] By volumetric analysis.

vól-ú-min-ous, a. [Lat. voluminosus, from volumen, genit. voluminis = a volume (q.v.); Fr. volumineux.]

*1. Consisting of many folds, coils, or convolutions. (Milton: P. L., ii. 652.)

2. Of great volume, bulk, or size; bulky, massive, extensive, large.

"I am not so voluminous and vast But there are lines, where with I might be embraced."
Ben Jonson: Underwoods.

3. Having written much; having produced many or bulky books; hence, copious, diffuse: as, a voluminous writer.

vól-ú-min-ous-ly, adv. [Eng. voluminous; -ly.] In a voluminous manner; in many volumes; very copiously or diffusely.

"They insisted on them so constantly and so voluminously."—Boisbrooks: Fragments of Essays, § 28.

vól-ú-min-ous-něss, s. [Eng. voluminous; -ness.]

1. The quality or state of being voluminous; bulkiness.

"The snake's adamantine voluminousness."
Shelley: A Vision of the Sea.

2. Copiousness, diffuseness.

"His works mount to that voluminousness they have very much by repetitions."—Dodwell: Letters of Advice, let. 2.

vól-ú-míst, a. [Eng. volume(s.); -ist.] A writer of a volume or volumes; an author.

"Hot volumists and cold bishops."—Milton: Anti-mad. upon Heron's Sermon's Defence. (Post.)

vól-ú-móm'-ě-těr, s. [VOLUMENOMETER.]

vól-ún-tar-í-ly, vól-un-tar-l-lic, vól-un-tar-y-ly, adv. [Eng. voluntary; -ly.] In a voluntary manner; of one's own free will or choice; spontaneously; without being moved, influenced, or compelled by others; freely.

"God acts not necessarily, but voluntarily."—Clarke: On the Passions, prop. 12.

vól-ún-tar-í-něss, s. [Eng. voluntary; -ness.]

*1. The quality or state of being voluntary or endowed with the power of choosing, willing, or determining.

2. The quality or state of being done or produced voluntarily or of free will and choice: as, the voluntariness of an action or gift.

vól-ún-tar-í-ous, a. [Lat. voluntarius.] Voluntary, free.

"Men of voluntarious will withstate that heuens governeth."—Chaucer: Test of Love, ii.

vól-ún-tar-í-ous-ly, adv. [Eng. voluntarius; -ly.] Voluntarily, willingly.

"Most pleasantly and voluntarily to bear the yoke of his most comfortable commandments."—Byrpe: Eccles. Mem.; Edu. VI. (Jan. 1550).

vól-ún-tar-ý, vól-un-tar-ic, a., adv., & s. [O. Fr. voluntaire; Fr. volontaire, from Lat. voluntarius = voluntary, from voluntas = free will, from volens, an old form of volens, pr. par. of volo = to wish, to be willing; Sp. & Port. voluntario; Ital. volontario.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Unrestrained by any external influence, force, or interference; not compelled, prompted, or suggested by another; acting of one's or its own free will, choice, or accord; spontaneous, free.

"Almighty God of his own voluntarý will."
Fisher: Seven Psalms, De Profundis.

2. Proceeding from the will; done or produced of one's own free will, accord, or choice; spontaneous.

"An action is neither good nor evil, unless it be voluntary and chosen."—Sp. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. iv., ch. i.

3. Pertaining to the will; subject to, controlled, or regulated by the will: as, the voluntary motions of animals.

4. Endowed with the power of willing, or of acting of one's own free will or choice, or according to one's own judgment.

"God did not work as a necessary, but a voluntary agent."—Hooker.

5. Done by design or intentionally; intentional, designed, intended, purposed; not accidental.

"Giving myself a voluntary wound."
Shaksp.: Julius Cæsar, ii. l.

6. Of, pertaining, or relating to voluntarism, or the doctrines of the voluntaries. [C. II. l.]

"What voluntary churches have done, and are doing, in sustaining their own worship and ministry."—British Quarterly Review, lvi. 40. (1873.)

II. Law: According to the will, consent, or agreement of a party; without a valuable (but possibly with a good) consideration; gratuitous, free.

B. As adv.: Voluntarily; of one's own free will or choice.

"I serve here voluntarily."—Shaksp.: Troilus & Cressida, ii. l.

C. As substantive:

I. Ord. Lang.: One who engages in any act or affair of his own free will and choice; a volunteer.

"Rash, inconsiderate, fiery volunteers."
Shaksp.: King John, ii.

II. Technically:

1. Eccles.: One who holds the tenets of Voluntaryism (q.v.).

"He thinks that in every district where the Voluntaries are the majority the fabric and the endowment of the Church should be made over to the Geneva or Presbyterian."—St. James's Gazette, March 7, 1888.

2. Music: An organ solo played before, during, or after any office of the Church; hence, called respectively introductory, middle, or concluding. Such solos were formerly, and are often now unpremeditated, or improvisations, as the name voluntary seems to imply.

"The vergers seemed to have settled among themselves that no visitor to the abbey has a right to hear the concluding voluntary."—Evening Standard, Jan. 12, 1886.

Law: An affidavit (or oath) made in an extra-judicial matter, or in a case for which the law has not provided.

Church Hist.: A controversy which arose in Scotland in 1851 with regard to the mutual relations which should subsist between the Civil Government and the Church. About the year 1780 a member of the Burgher denomination (BURGER) published a pamphlet, in which he advocated what is now called Voluntaryism (q.v.), and in May, 1795, proposed a modification of the Confession of Faith in conformity with the new views. The Synod ultimately granted the prayer of the petition, a minority withdrawing in 1799 and becoming known as the Old Light Burghers. The same change of views appeared with similar results somewhat later among the Anti-Burghers. In May, 1804, they superseded their "Act and Testimony," which was in favour of Establishments, by the "Narrative and Testimony," the acceptance of which they made a condition of Communion. Four ministers withdrawing in 1806, formed themselves into the Constitutional Associate Presbytery. The two denominations, which had on one point modified their creed, joining in 1820, became the United Secession. Up till this time, and for some years subsequently, the Voluntary Controversy had attracted little notice, but in 1831 it began to excite great attention throughout Scotland, the leading ministers of the Established Church on the one hand, and those of the United Secession on the other, carrying it on with the greatest ardour. The controversy had far-reaching consequences. To a certain extent it was to strengthen the Established Presbyterian Church on points on which its "voluntary" assailants had declared it weak that Dr. Chalmers proposed the Veto Act (q.v.), with the unexpected result of ultimately producing the Disruption. In the contest on the part of English Nonconformists for "religious equality" they maintain essentially the same views as the Scottish United Secessionists did in the Voluntary Controversy. [LIBERATION-SOCIETY.]

Law: A conveyance which may be made merely on a good, but not a valuable consideration. [VOLUNTARY, A. II.]

voluntary-jurisdiction, s.

Law: A jurisdiction exercised in matters admitting of no opposition of question, and therefore cognizable by any judge, in any place, on any lawful day.

Anat. & Physiol.: Muscles excited by the stimulus of the will or volition acting on them through the nerves, though some of them habitually, and all of them occasionally, act also under the influence of other stimuli. They are the muscles of locomotion, respiration, expression, and some others. (Quain.) [MUSCLE.]

voluntary-principle, s. The principle of Voluntaryism (q.v.).

voluntary-schools, s. pl. Public elementary schools managed by voluntary bodies (mainly religious), the cost of such schools being partly defrayed by voluntary subscriptions. Until 1870 all elementary schools were fáte, fát, fáre, amidst, whát, fáll, fáther; wě, wět, hère, camčl, hěr, thère; pine, pít, síre, sír, maríne; gō, pět, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, uníte, cūr, rúle, fúll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

of this nature. In that year, however, education was made compulsory by the Education Act, and board schools came into existence. Voluntary and board schools agree in the following points:

- 1. The average weekly fee must not exceed 9d., and the average attendance must not be less than 20.
2. Religious instruction is subject to a "conscience clause," and can only be given at the beginning or end of school.
3. The head teacher must be certificated.
4. The schools are annually examined and reported on by a Government Inspector, who may also visit any school at any time.
5. A money grant is made by Government to the schools approved of by the Inspector; such grant being assessed according to merit.
In the decade between August, 1876, and August, 1886, the voluntary schools rose from 12,677 to 14,620 (an increase of about 15 per cent.), and the board schools from 1,660 to 4,402 (or about 175 per cent.).

voluntary-waste, s. Law: Waste which is the result of the voluntary act of the tenant of property; as where he cuts down timber, pulls down a wall, or the like, without the consent of the proprietor.

völ-ün-tar-ý-ism, s. [Eng. voluntarism; -ism.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Spontaneity (q.v.). "He said voluntarism was a most precious ingredient in all good works, but it needed regulation by authority." - Victoria Magazine, Nov., 1866, p. 64.

2. Theol. & Church Hist.: The view or tenet that the Church should derive its support only from the voluntary contributions of its members, and cannot, without becoming a party to political injustice, losing its own liberty, and running the risk of having its purity corrupted, ask or accept establishment, endowment, or financial support from the State, or from inferior civil authorities. Carried out with logical rigour, voluntarism should also decline to permit its churches and Sunday-school buildings to be exempt from the payment of rates. This extreme view is entertained only by individuals; the immense mass of those who profess Voluntarism hold that this limited amount of support or endowment is indirect, and need not be rejected. [VOLUNTARY-CONTROVERSY.]

"Elsewhere in Scotland the same conviction has led to a farewell to establishment, and to a voluntarism more consolidated than any other in Europe." - Pall Mall Gazette, Aug. 21, 1884.

völ-ün-tečr, s. & a. [Fr. volontaire = a volunteer, from Lat. voluntarius = voluntary (q.v.).]

A. As substantive:

1. One who enters into any service, or undertakes any duty of his own free will.

"Honest instinct comes a volunteer." Pope: Essay on Man, III. 88.

2. Specifically, one who of his own free will offers his services to the state in a military capacity, without the stipulation of pay or other substantial reward. Only two modern countries, the United States and England, depend largely upon Volunteers to supply the place of a large standing army. In the several nations of the continent of Europe military duty is enforced, all able-bodied citizens being held liable and required to become trained as part of the regular army. The United States and England, on the contrary, have each a small standing army of voluntary recruits, and trust for farther military duty to the patriotic spirit of their citizens, and to the training of their volunteer organizations of citizen soldiery. The military efficiency of a nation without a large standing army was remarkably proved in the American Civil War, whose armies on both sides were almost entirely made up of volunteer soldiery, and in which the courage and ability displayed were all that could be desired. Since this war much attention has been paid to military drill, each state having its own body of state militia, well trained and equipped, and required each year to go through a certain course of camp duty. The whole body thus organized is sufficient in number to make an excellent nucleus of an army in case of war. In Great Britain dependence is placed on a similar body of citizen soldiery, whose organization in its present form was due to a war scare in 1859, which brought a large force of armed volunteers spontaneously into the field. Since that date the volunteer organization has been kept up, and a considerable body of well drilled citizen soldiery now exists.

B. As adj.: Entering into any service, or undertaking any duty of one's own free will; consisting of volunteers.

"A volunteer force of nearly 3,000 officers and men will be engaged." - Daily Telegraph, March 22, 1883.

völ-ün-tečr, v.t. & i. [VOLUNTEER, a.]

A. Trans.: To offer or bestow voluntarily, or of one's own free will and choice.

"Agents who had already volunteered their services against him." - Ben Jonson: Foxtaster, III. 1. (Note.)

B. Intrans.: To offer one's services voluntarily; specifically, to offer to serve as a volunteer.

"You'll need an equipage for volunteering." Dryden: King Arthur. (Erol.)

*völ-ün-tý, *völ-ün-tě, s. [Fr. volonté.] Free-will.

"Of his own mere volente and free will." - Palsyn: Chronycle; Richard II. (ou. 1399).

*völ-ü-pěre, s. [O. Fr.] A cap, a night-cap.

"Hire white volupera." Chaucer: C. T., 3,241.

völ-lüp-tu-a-ry, s. & a. [Fr. voluptuaire, from Lat. voluptuarius = devoted to pleasure, from voluptas = pleasure, from volo = to wish.]

A. As subst.: One who is wholly given to luxury or the gratification of the appetite and other sensual pleasures.

"In poverty and exile he rose from a voluptuary into a hero." - Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

B. As adj.: Wholly given or devoted to pleasure; voluptuous.

"Art voluptuary, which Tacitus truly called eruditus lascivus." - Bacon: Adv. of Learn., bk. II.

*völ-lüp-tu-äte, v.t. [Lat. voluptas = pleasure.] To convert or devote to pleasure.

"Ths watching and labour that voluptuate repose and sleep." - Feltham: Resolves, 42.

*völ-lüp-tu-ös-ý-tý, *vo-lup-tu-os-ý-tie, *vo-lup-tu-os-ý-te, s. [Lat. voluptuosus = full of pleasure, voluptuous (q.v.).] A disposition to indulge in sensual pleasures; voluptuousness.

"In the tender wittes be speakes of voluptuosity." - Elyot: Governour, bk. I. ch. vi.

völ-lüp-tu-ös, a. [Fr. voluptueux, from Lat. voluptuosus = full of pleasure, from voluptas = pleasure, from volo = to wish; Sp. & Port. voluptuoso.]

1. Pertaining to, proceeding from, or based on sensual pleasure.

"That love he drave you nat to dooe this dede But lust voluptuous." Chaucer: Troilus & Criseide, v.

2. Contributing to sensual pleasure; exciting, or tending to excite, sensual desires; gratifying the senses; sensual: as voluptuous charms.

3. Passed or spent in sensual pleasures.

"Softened with pleasure and voluptuous life." Milton: Samson Agonistes, 534.

4. Given or devoted to sensual pleasures or gratifications; sensual.

"The jolly and voluptuous livera." - Atterbury: Sermons, vol. IV. ser. 4.

völ-lüp-tu-ös-ly, adv. [Eng. voluptuous; -ly.] In a voluptuous manner; with free indulgence in sensual pleasures; luxuriously, sensually.

"Heritikes sein they chosen life bestial, that voluptuously lyech." - Chaucer: Testament of Love, bk. II.

völ-lüp-tu-ös-něss, *vo-lup-tu-ös-něs, s. [Eng. voluptuous; -ness.] The quality or state of being voluptuous, or addicted to free indulgence in sensual pleasures; luxuriousness, sensuality.

"Suuk in voluptuousness and Indolence." - Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. IX.

*völ-lüp-tý, *vo-lup-tie, s. [Lat. voluptus = pleasure.] Voluptuousness. (Sir T. Elyot: Governour, bk. III., ch. XIX.)

Völ-üs-pa, a. [Properly the lay or song of the Volva, a Scandinavian prophetess, but applied in error by Sir W. Scott to the prophetess herself.] A Scandinavian prophetess or sibyl.

völ-lü-ta, s. [Lat., fem. of volutus, pa. par. of volo = to roll.]

*1. Arch.: A volute (q.v.).

"There are also volutas in the Corinthian and compounded capitals." - Evelyn: Architecture.

2. Zool. & Palæont.: The type-genus of Volutida; with seventy recent species from the West Indies, Cape Horn, West Africa, Australia, Java, and Chili, and eighty fossil species, from the Chalk onward, but the genus is mainly Tertiary and recent. Shell ventricose, thick; spire short, apex mammillated; aperture large, deeply notched in front; columella with several plicis; operculum present in a few species. There are many sub-genera; the most important in Volutiflithes, in which the plicis of the columella are indistinct, with one recent species; fossil in the Eocene.

völ-ü-ta-ry, a. [Lat. volutus, pa. par. of volo = to roll.] (See compound.)

voluntary-press, s. A clamping-machine (q.v.).

*völ-ü-tä-tion, s. [Lat. volutatio, from volutus, pa. par. of volutus, frequent. of volo (pa. par. volutus) = to roll.] The act of state of rolling or wallowing, as of a body on the earth.

"In the sea, when the storm is over, there remains still an inward working and volutation." - Sp. Raynolds: On the Passions, ch. XXI.

völ-üte, a. & s. [Fr., from Lat. voluta, fem. of volutus, pa. par. of volo = to roll.]

A. As adjective: Bot.: Rolled up.

B. As substantive:

1. Arch.: A kind of spiral scroll used in Ionic, Corinthian, and Composite capitals, of which it is a principal ornament.

The number of volutes in the Ionic order is four. In the Corinthian and Composite orders they are more numerous, in the former being accompanied by smaller ones, called helices. Called also voluta.

2. Zool.: Any individual of the genus Voluta (q.v.).

volute-compasses, s. pl. A draftsman's compasses in which the legs are gradually expanded, so as to trace a spiral.

volute-spring, s. A helical spring (q.v.).

volute-wheel, s.

1. A volute-shaped shell, that in revolving presents its open mouth to the air, which is thus gathered into the tube and discharged through the hollow axis. It is a common and effective sort of blower.

2. A water-wheel with radial or curved buckets, in which the periphery of the wheel is surrounded by a volute-shaped casing or scroll, which confines the water against the wheel. (See illustration.)

IONIC CAPITAL, SHOWING VOLUTE.

VOLUTE-WHEEL. a. Water pouring into the buckets; b. Waste water.

völ-lüt-čd, a. [Eng. volute(-); -al.] Arch.: Having a volute or spiral scroll.

†völ-ü-těl-ia, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from voluta (q.v.).] Zool.: D'Orbigny's name for Voluta (q.v.).

völ-lü-ti-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. voluta(-); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

1. Zool.: A family of Siphonostomatous Gasteropods. Woodward enumerates five genera (Voluta, Cymba, Mitra, Volvaria, and Marginella), to which Tate adds Columbella, which Woodward reckons a sub-genus of Columbella, of the Buccinidae. Shell turreted or convolute; aperture notched in front; columella obliquely plicated; no operculum. Animal with a recurved siphon; foot very large, partly hiding the shell; mantle often lobed and reflected over the shell; eyes on tentacles or near their base. The living members are chiefly from warm seas, and are often remarkable for their brilliant coloration.

2. Palæont.: The family appears late in the Chalk, but is abundant in the Tertiaries, and attains its maximum in recent times.

völ-lü-ti-lith-čs, s. [Mod. Lat. voluta, and Gr. λίθος (lithos) = a stone.] [VOLUTA, 2.]

*vō-lū-tion, s. [Lat. volutio, from volutus, pa. par. of volvo = to roll.] A spiral turn, a convolution, a revolution.

"The swift volution and the enormous train." Falconer: Shipwreck, ll. 45.

vōl'-vā, s. [Lat. = a wrapper, a covering.]

Bot.: The involucre-like base of the stipe of Agaricus. Originally it was a bag enveloping the whole plant, which, however, elongating, burst through it, leaving it torn.

vōl'-vār'-ī-a, s. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. volva = a wrapper, from volvo = to roll.]

Zool. & Paleont.: A genus of Volutidae (q.v.), with twenty-nine recent species, from tropical seas. Shell cylindrical, convoluted; spire minute, aperture long and narrow; columella with three oblique plaits in front. Fossil in the Eocene of Britain and France.

*volve, v.t. [Lat. volvo = to roll, to turn.] To turn over. (Berners: Froissart; Cron. Fr.)

vōl'-vō-cin'-ē-ae, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. volvox, genit. volvo(c)s; Lat. fem. pl. adj. snff. -ae.]

Bot.: A family of Convolvaceae, placed by Ehrenberg under his Infusoria, but which Siebold, Williamson, Busk, and Cohn have shown to be convolvoid Algae. Nearly microscopic plants, composed of many zoospore-like bodies associated into spherical or quadrangular colonies, the separate members of which, connected or held together in various ways by cell membrane, retain their distinct individuality for all purposes of nutrition, growth, and reproduction. They are inhabitants of freshwater ponds, in which the whole colony is carried to a circular and progressive movement by the vibratile motion of the cilia, which project from the separate individuals through the jelly into the water. They exhibit in their maturity the characters of the transitory zoospores of other convolvoids.

vōl'-vōx, s. [Lat. volvo = to roll. Named from its rotary motion. (See def.)]

Bot.: The typical genus of Volvocineae (q.v.), with one species, Volvox globator. To the naked eye it resembles a minute pale-green globule floating about in the water. Under the microscope it is seen to be a spherical membranous sac, studded with innumerable green points, really apertures giving exit to cilia, which enable it to roll over and over in the water. Within the sac are various dense globules, generally green in summer, but often of an orange-colour in autumn and early winter. They are zoospore-like bodies, each sending a pair of cilia through separate orifices. There is a reddish-brown spot and a contractile vacuole. Found abundantly in clear pools on open commons and similar localities.

vōl'-vū-lūs, s. [Lat. volvo = to roll, to turn about.]

Pathol.: The ileac passion, because it was supposed to arise from a twitching of the bowels.

*vōme, s. [Lat. vomo = to vomit.] Vomit.

"All forsothe the ben fulfid with the vomie and filthie." Wycliffe: Isaiah xxviii. 2.

vō-mēr, s. [Lat. = a ploughshare.]

1. Comp. Anat.: A small thin bone in the median line, forming the posterior and principal portion of the partition between the nostrils in man. It exhibits many modifications in the different classes of Vertebrata. In Fishes an important character is the presence or absence of teeth on the vomer (that is, along the middle line of the roof of the mouth). The bone is so named from the fact that in man it bears some resemblance to a ploughshare. [Etyim.]

2. Paleont.: A genus of Carangidae, allied to Caranx, from the Chalk of Comen in Istria.

vō-mēr-ine, a. [Eng. vomer; -ine.] Of or pertaining to the vomer; situated on the vomer. (Günther.)

vōm'-ic, a. [VOMICA.] Purulent, ulcerous.

vomic-nut, s. The nut of Strychnos Nux vomica. [NUX-VOMICA, STRYCHNOS]

vōm'-ī-ca, s. [Lat. = a sore, a boil.]

Pathol.: An abscess in the substance of the lungs produced by the resolution of tubercles.

*vom-ing, *vom-yng, s. [VOME.] Vomiting; vomit. (Wycliffe: Jer. xviii. 5d.)

vōm'-it, *vom-ete, vo-my't, v.t. & t. [Lat. vomito, from vomitus = a vomiting, vomit (q.v.); Sp. & Port. vomitar; Ital. vomitare.]

A. Intrans.: To eject the contents of the stomach by the mouth; to spew, to puke.

B. Transitive.

1. Lit.: To throw up or eject from the stomach by the mouth; to spew out. (Often with up, forth, or out.)

"The fish vomited out Jonah upon the dry land."—Jonah ii. 10.

2. Fig.: To eject or discharge, as from a hollow place; to belch out.

"The volcano, which was about four miles to the west of us, vomited up vast quantities of fire and smoke."—Cook: Second Voyage, bk. iii., ch. v.

vōm'-it, *vom-ite, *vom-yte, s. [Lat. vomitus = vomit, prop. pa. par. of vomo = to vomit; cogn. with Gr. ἐμῶ (emō) = to vomit; Sansc. vam; Sp., Port., & Ital. vomito.]

1. The matter ejected from the stomach in vomiting. (Spenser: F. Q., l. i. 20.)

2. A medicine or other preparation which causes the stomach to discharge its contents; an emetic. (Arbutus.)

¶ Black vomit: [BLACK VOMIT.]

vomit-nut, s. [VOMIC-NUT.]

vōm'-it-ing, pr. par. a., & s. [VOMIT, s.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. The act of ejecting the contents of the stomach by the mouth.

¶ Vomiting is generally preceded by feelings of nausea, during which there is a copious flow of saliva into the mouth. This being swallowed carries down with it a certain quantity of air, which, assisting in the opening of the cardiac sphincter, facilitates the discharge of the contents of the stomach. There generally follows ineffectual retching, during which there is a deep inspiration, by which the diaphragm is thrust down as low as possible against the stomach, the lower ribs being at the same time drawn in. Then there is a sudden expiratory contraction of the abdominal walls, so that the stomach is compressed without, and its contents sent up the œsophagus. The primary origin of vomiting may be gastric or cerebral.

2. That which is vomited; vomit.

"And why may not Pancrone as well hid his servants . . . hold the chalice to beauty vomitings?"—Bp. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. iv., ch. l.

*vō-mī-tion, s. [Lat. vomitio, from vomitus.] [VOMIT, s.] The act or power of vomiting.

"If the stomach had wanted the faculty of vomition, they had inevitably died."—Greve: Cosmo, Sacra.

*vōm'-i-tive, a. [Fr. vomitif.] Causing to vomit; emetic.

"Glass of antimony and crocus metallorum, being either of them infused in a great proportion of wine, will make it vomitive."—Boyle: Works, iii. 671.

vō-mī-tō, s. [Sp. vomit.] [VOMIT, s. ¶.] The yellow fever in its worst form, when it is usually attended with black vomit.

vōm'-i-tōr-ī-y, *vom-i-tor-īe, a. & s. [Lat. vomitorius = causing vomiting; vomiting; hence vomitoria (neut. pl.), passages in a theatre, by which people entered and came out, from vomo = to vomit.]

A. As adj.: Causing vomiting; emetic.

"By taking vomitories privately."—Harvey: On Consumption.

B. As substantive:

*1. An emetic.

"Usually taken to the forehead weight, with honey, for vomitoria."—P. Holland: Pline, bk. xxvi., ch. vii.

2. Arch.: An opening, gate, or door, in an ancient theatre or amphitheatre, which gave ingress and egress to the spectators.

"Sixty-four vomitories . . . poured forth the immense multitude."—Gibbon: Decline & Fall, ch. xii.

*vōm-i-tū-rī-tion, s. [As if from a Lat. vomitatio, desiderative from vomito = to vomit.]

1. An ineffectual attempt to vomit; a retching.

2. The vomiting of but little matter; vomiting with little effort.

Vōo-dōō', Vaudoux (as Vō-dō'), s. & a. [Native African = the all-powerful and supernatural being, the non-venomous serpent on whom depend all the events which take place in the world. (Spencer St. John: Hayti, p. 180.) Mr. Newell (Amer. Jour. Folk-lore, No. 1) suggests that the word is a corruption of Vaudois (q.v.), but the suggestion has found little favour among English anthropologists.]

A. As substantive:

1. (See extract.)

"As generally understood, Voodoo means the persistence, in Hayti, of abominable magic, mysticism, and cannibalism, brought originally from Africa."—Daily News, June, 12, 1884.

2. A negro sorcerer or witch who practises human sacrifice and cannibalism.

B. As adj.: Belonging to, connected with, or practising a system of magic, human sacrifice, and cannibalism. [A. 1.]

Min.: A resinous variety of the mineral Serpentine (q.v.), of a brown to greenish-black colour. Hardness, 3-5; sp. gr. 2-45. Found in the Fleins Valley, Tyrol.

vor'-tēx (pl. vor-ti-cēg, vor-tēx-ēg), s. [Lat. vortex, vertex, from verto = to turn.]

Physics: The form assumed when any portion of a fluid is set rotating on an axis; a whirling or circular motion of any fluid, either of water or air, forming a kind of cavity in the centre of the circle, and in some instances drawing up the water or absorbing other things. Eddies, whirlpools, waterspouts, whirlwinds, &c., are familiar examples.

¶ Descartes's vortices:

Astron. & Physics: An hypothesis proposed by René Descartes (A. D. 1596-1650) to account for the movements of the heavenly bodies. He supposed space filled with fluid matter, and that each fixed star or planet exerted some influence on the matter for a certain distance round itself; this space he called its "heaven." The sun's heaven was moved around it after the manner of a vortex or whirlpool, carrying with it the planets, around which their heavens moved as minor vortices. Newton controverted the Cartesian view, which long retarded the acceptance of the gravitation theory in Europe.

vortex-atom, s.

Physics: A name sometimes given to the ultimate parts of matter which, on the Vortex-theory of Sir W. Thomson, may be inconceivably small vortices in the ether.

vortex-ring, s.

Physics: A vortical molecular filament or column returning into itself so as to form a ring composed of a number of small rotating circles placed side by side. All such rings have two motions: a motion of translation, and a vortical motion; but the vortical motion of the inner portions of the ring appears to coincide with the motion of translation, whilst that of the outer portions is in a contrary direction to it. Vortex-rings may be made in a glass of water by dropping milk or ink into it, but the rings are so small that the only motion perceptible is that which carries them to the bottom of the glass. The simplest method of showing vortex-rings in air is to take an ordinary match-box and make a small round hole in one end; in the inner portion of the box put a little dry tobacco, light it, and close the box. By giving the end of the box opposite the hole a smart tap with the finger, tiny smoke-rings will issue from the orifice. It should be borne in mind that the smoke has nothing to do with the vortex, which is in the air—the smoke only renders it visible.

vortex-wheel, vortex water-wheel, s. A kind of turbine in which the water enters tangentially at the surface and is discharged at the centre.

vor-ti-cal, *vor-ti-call, a. [Lat. vortex, genit. vortici = a vortex (q.v.).] Pertaining to or resembling a vortex; whirling, revolving.

"It is not a magnetical power, nor the effect of a vortical motion."—Bentley's Sermons.

*vor-ti-cal-ly, adv. [Eng. vortical; -ly.] In a vortical manner; with a whirling or revolving motion.

vor-ti-cel-la, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from Lat. vortex (q.v.).]

Zool.: Bell-animalcule; the type-genus of Vorticellina (q.v.), with numerous species from salt and fresh water. Attached posteriorly by a simple, undivided, contractile thread-like pedicle, enclosing an elastic muscular fibrilla, and assuming on contraction a much shortened and usually cork-screw-like contour. (See illustration under Bell-animalcule.) The adoral system consists of a spirally convoluted, ciliary wreath, the right limb of which descends into the oral or vestibular fossa, the left obliquely elevated and encircling the rotatory or ciliary disc; oral fossa on ventral side, continued into a conspicuous pharynx.

vor-ti-cel-li-d, vor-ti-cel-li-dan, s. [VORTICELLIDÆ.] Any individual of the Vorticellidæ (q.v.). (Saville Kent: Infusoria, li. 671.)

vor-ti-cel-li-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vorticell(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of Peritrichous Infusoria, with three sub-families: Vorticellina, Vaginocolina, and Ophrydina. Animalcules sedentary or attached, from salt or fresh water, ovate, campanulate, or sub-cylindrical; oral aperture terminal, eccentric, associated with a spiral fringe of adoral cilia, the right limb of which descends into the oral aperture, the left limb encircling a more or less elevated, protrusible, and retractile ciliary disc. They increase by fission, by the conjugation of two dissimilar zooids, the one (male?) minute and migrant, the other (female?) normal and sedentary, and by the development out of the endoplasm of minute free-swimming germs.

vor-ti-cel-li-na, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vorticell(a); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Zool.: A sub-family of Vorticellidæ, with eleven genera. Animalcules naked, long, sessile.

vor-ti-cēs, s. pl. [VORTEX.]

*vor-ti-cial (of as sh), a. [VORTICAL.] Whirling, vortical (q.v.).

"Cyclo and seemingly gyrating or vortical movements."—Poe: Eureka (Works 1841), li. 205.

vor-ti-cōse, a. [Lat. vortex, genit. vortici = a vortex (q.v.).] Whirling, vortical, revolving.

*vor-tig-in-ōus, a. [VORTEX.] Having a motion revolving round an axis or centre; vortical.

"Lifting high his angry tide Fortiginous."—Cooper: Homer; Iliad xxi.

vōs-gīte, s. [After the Voogea, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An altered labradorite found in a porphyritic rock. Sp. gr. 2.771; colour, white to greenish or bluish; lustre, greasy.

vō-tar-ēss, *vōt-rēss, s. [Eng. votary; -ess.] A female votary; a female devoted to any service, worship, or state of life.

"Beans having been made use of by the voters among the Athenians in the choice of magistrates."—Tatler, No. 240.

vōt-īng, pr. par. or a. [Vox, v.] Voting in past times was largely performed openly, in many instances by acclamation of an assembled people. In ancient Greece voting was either by show of hands or by ballot—the latter intended for secrecy; the ballot being a white or black ball dropped secretly into a box, or a marked potsherd similarly deposited. It was not until 1872 that the secret ballot at parliamentary and municipal elections was adopted in England. In the New England States the practice of secret voting has always been in vogue, and it has long been practiced throughout the United States, while it has become common in most other countries. As the secrecy of the ballot, however, was evaded by several partisan devices, a new ballot system, permitting complete secrecy, recently devised in Australia, has been made the law in many states of the Union, and in some other countries. In this system, in its most common form, the names of all candidates are printed on a single sheet, and are voted for by making a cross at the head of a party list, if the voter favors the whole ticket, or opposite each name, if he desires to divide his vote among the party candidates.

voting-machine, s. An automatic contrivance for securing accuracy in the recording, counting, &c., of votes.

voting-paper, s. A ballot or paper for a ballot.

vōt-ive, a. [Lat. votivus, from votum = a vow; Fr. votif; Sp. & Port. votivo.] 1. Given, paid, or consecrated in consequence or in fulfilment of a vow.

vou-ter-y, s. [AVOUTERIE.] Adultery. (Wycliffe: Jeremiah xvii. 27.) vow, vou, vowe, s. [O. Fr. vou, vou, vou (Fr. vou) = a vow, from Lat. votum = a thing vowed, a vow; prop. neut. sing. of votus, pa. par. of voveo = to promise, to vow; Sp. & Ital. voto. Vote and vow are doublets. Arise is a compound from vow, by the prefixing of a = Lat. ad.] [A_{VOU}.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A solemn promise; a kind of promissory oath made to God, or to some deity, to perform some act, or to dedicate to the deity something of value, on the fulfillment of certain conditions, or in the event of the vower receiving something specially desired, as recovery from illness, deliverance from danger, success in an enterprise, or the like.

"A vow, being a promise made solemnly to God, partakes of the nature of an oath."
-Secker: Works, vol. vii., lect. 29.

2. A solemn promise to follow out some line of conduct, or to consecrate or devote one's self, wholly or in part, for a longer or shorter time, to some act or service.

3. A solemn promise or declaration of fidelity and constancy.

"It is the hour when lovers' vows Seem sweet in every whispered word."
Byron: Paradise, I.

*4. A solemn asseveration or declaration.

"To ascertain my vow of thanks and praise."
Shakesp.: 2 Henry VI., iv. 3.

II. Eccles. & Church Hist.: A special promise made to God to do or forgo something for the promotion of his glory. The subject-matter must always consist of "a greater good." In ecclesiastical language "de bono meliori." The practice of making vows appears in the religious history of all races in any degree civilized. It entered largely into the Mosaic Dispensation (Gen. xxviii. 20-22; Lev. xvii. 2; Num. xxx. 2, &c.) In Dent. xiii. 21, the necessity of fulfilling a vow is insisted on (cf. Eccles. v. 4, 5), but in the following verse it is pointed out that there is no sin in forbearing to make a vow. The practice continued among the Jews in New Testament times (Acts xviii. 18). With the rise of monachism (q. v.), vows to observe the evangelical counsils of voluntary poverty, perpetual chastity, and entire obedience, became common and prevailed to the Church till the Reformation, when the Reformers taught that, since it was the duty of every man to devote himself and all his possessions to the service of God, vows were unnecessary. Vows, however, still enter largely into the religious system of the Roman Church. To the three vows (poverty, chastity, and obedience) taken by all religions (Religious, B.), a fourth, that of stability (= remaining in the order) is sometimes added. In addition to these there are private vows—of chastity, pilgrimage, &c. Vows are of two kinds: simple and solemn, the difference between them being that the latter are instituted as such, and accepted as irrevocable by the Church, and they constitute one of the works of a religious order as distinguished from a congregation [ORDER, s., ¶ (9)]. Simple and solemn vows differ also in their effects. A simple vow makes marriage unlawful, and deprives the person who has made it of a right to use any property he may possess; a solemn vow makes marriage invalid, and takes away all dominion over property. Solemn and certain simple vows, as those of chastity and of greater pilgrimage, can only be dispensed by the Pope, or by a superior specially delegated for the purpose; but most of the simple vows can be dispensed by the bishop of the diocese in which the person who has made the vow resides.

vow-breach, vow-break, s. The breaking of a vow or vows.

"Sacrilege and vow-break in Ananias and Sapphira made them descend quick into their graves."
-Jeremy Taylor: Holy Dying.

vow-breaker, s. One who breaks his vow or vows.

"And this is that holy bishop Paphnutius, whom the envious vow-breakers pretend to be their procurator for their venial marriage."
-Jerome: Defence of Apology, p. 162.

vow-fellow, s. One who is bound by the same vow.

"Vow-fellows with this virtuous king."
Shakesp.: Love's Labour's Lost, II.

vow, vowe, vow-en, v.t. & i. [O. Fr. vover, (Fr. vover).] [Vow, v.]

A. Transitive:

1. To promise solemnly; to give, consecrate, or dedicate by a vow or solemn promise, as to God or a deity.

"When thou vowest a vow defer not to pay it . . . pay that which thou hast vowed."
-Eccles. v. 4.

2. To threaten or denounce solemnly or upon oath.

"That he may vow revenge on him."
Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 1179.

B. Intransitive:

1. To make a vow or solemn promise; to bind one's self by a vow.

"He that vows never to have an ill thought, never to commit an error, hath taken a course, that his little infirmities shall become crimes."
-H. Taylor: Sermons, vol. 4, ser. 14.

2. To asseverate or protest solemnly.

"We heard him vow and vow to God.
He came but to the duke of Lancaster."
Shakesp.: 1 Henry IV., iv. 2.

A. As a pa. par.: (See the verb).

B. As adjective:

1. Devoted, consecrated, or dedicated by a vow.

"Never faith could hold, if not to beauty vowed."
Shakesp.: Passionate Pilgrim, 58.

*2. Confirmed by oath; sworn to.

"With a vowed contract."
Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, v.

3. Sworn, constant, inveterate, confirmed.

"[The] vowed toe of my fellicite."
Spenser: F. Q. I. xii. 19.

vow-ël, vow-ell, s. & a. [Fr. voyelle = a vowel, from Lat. vocalem, accus. of vocalis = sounding, vocal (q. v.); Sp. vocal; Port. vogal; Ital. vocale.]

A. As substantive:

1. A sound that is uttered by simply opening the mouth or vocal organs; a sound produced by the vibration of the vocal chords. The pitch or tone of a vowel is determined by the vocal chords, but its quality depends upon the configuration of the mouth or buccal tube A, i, and u are by philologists called the primitive vowels, and from them all the various vowel sounds in the Aryan languages have been developed. A vowel differs from a consonant in that the former can be pronounced by itself, while a consonant requires the aid of a vowel to be sounded with it. While there are only five vowels, i. e., characters representing such sounds, there are fourteen vowel and five diphthongal sounds in English.

"For the formation of the three principal vowels we give the interior of the mouth two extreme positions. In one we round the lips and draw down the tongue, so that the cavity of the mouth assumes the shape of a bottle without a neck, and we pronounce a. In the other we narrow the lips and draw up the tongue as high as possible, so that the buccal tube represents a bottle with a very wide neck, and we pronounce i in French and German. If the lips are wide open, and the tongue lies flat and in its natural position, we pronounce e. Between these elementary articulations there is an indefinite variety of vowel sounds."
-Morris: Hist. Outlines of English Accidence, § 47.

2. A letter or character representing such a sound.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to a vowel; vocal.

vowel-points, s. pl. [POINT, s., ¶ 16.]

vox-angelica, s. [Lat.]

Music: An organ-stop consisting of two ranks of pipes of small scale and delicate quality of tone, one of which is tuned slightly sharp, in order to produce a wavy and tremulous sound. Called also Voix celeste, unda maris, &c.

vox-humana, s. [Lat.]

Music: A reed stop in the organ intended to imitate the sounds of the human voice, consisting of a large reed and short tube; called vox humana in Italian, voix humaine in French, and also anthropologia.

voy-age (age as īg), *ve-age, *vi-age, vy-age, s. [O. Fr. viage (Fr. voyage), from Lat. viaticum = provisions or requisites for a journey; from viaticus = pertaining to a journey, from via = a way, a journey; Ital. viaggio; Sp. viage; Prov. viatge.] [WAV.]

"1. A journey, whether by land or by sea.
"To Scotland now he fomes, to redy his viage."
Robert de Brunne, p. 214.

"2. A journey or passing by sea or water from one place or country to another, especially a journey by water to a place far distant.

"3. The practice or habit of travelling, especially from one country to another.

"All nations have interknowledge of one another, by voyage into foreign parts, or strangers that come to them."—Bacon.

"4. Any course or way taken; an attempt.
"If he should intend this voyage towards my wife."
—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, II. 1.

"5. One of the most remarkable voyages of antiquity was that of Solomon and Hiram's navigators to India, or some place to which its productions were brought. The names of the apes, peacocks, &c., obtained are Malabar words, which suggests that South-Western India itself was visited. An exploring expedition sent out by Pharaoh Necho about 604 B.C. is said to have sailed round Africa. The Periplus of Hanno the Carthaginian, B.C. 400, was also a great nautical exploit. The discovery of America by Columbus 1492, and the passage of the Cape of Good Hope by Vasco de Gama, with his ultimate arrival in India (A.D. 1497), constitute two of the greatest nautical enterprises of modern times. After these rank the expeditions which circumnavigated the globe [CIRCUMNAVIGATION] and those for the discovery of the North-East and North-West passages. [NORTH-EAST, ¶; NORTH-WEST, ¶.]

voy-age (age as īg), v.t. & t. [Fr. voyager.] [VOYAGE, s.]

A. Intrans.: To travel; to make a journey or voyage; to travel by water.

"Life hath not bin onexpensive in learning, and voyaging about."—Milton: Apol. for Smeacynus, § 8.

B. Trans.: To travel or pass over; to traverse.

"I with pain Voyage'd th' nurnal, vast unbounded deep."
Milton: P. L., c. 471.

voy-age-a-ble (age as īg), a. [Eng. voyage; -able.] Capable of being travelled or sailed over; navigable.

voy-āg-ēr (age as īg), s. [Eng. voyage; -er.]

One who travels or passes by water from one place or country to another.

"Long shall the voyager, with th' Ionian blast, Hail the bright dimes of battle and of song."
Byron: Child Harold, II. 81.

voy-a-geūr (g es sh), s. [Fr.] A traveller; especially applied in Canada to a class of men employed by the fur companies in transporting goods by the rivers and across the land to and from the remote stations of the north-west. They are nearly all French Canadians or half-breeds. A number of them were employed by the British government in transporting stores, &c., up the Nile, in the expedition for the relief of Khartoum, in 1884.

"Over one hundred whaleboats are at Omsk awaiting the return of voyagers to start."—Pitt Mail Gazette, Nov. 25, 1884.

vūgg, vugh, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Min.: A cavity; a hollow in a rock, or in a lode; a vogle.

Vul-cān, s. [Lat. Vulcanus.]

"1. Rom. Antiq.: The god who presided over the working of metals. He was the son of Jupiter, who, incensed at his interferences on the part of his mother, Juno, cast him out of heaven; he fell in the Isle of Lemnos, and broke his leg in the fall. He was the patron of armourers and workers in metal. There is about the character of Vulcan much of the usual confusion belonging to Greek mythology. Cicero mentions three Vulcans, besides the son of Jupiter; one, the child of Uranus; another, of Nilus, who reigned in Egypt; a third of Menalius. A peculiarity attending the worship of Vulcan was, that the victims were wholly consumed, in reference to his character as god of fire. In sculpture he is represented as bearded, with a hammer and pincers, and a pointed cap. He had under him, as workmen, the Cyclopes, whose workshop was on Mount Etna, where thunderbolts were forged. He is identified with the Greek Hephaestus.

"2. Astron.: The name given to a planet, imaginary or real, between the Sun and Mercury. On March 26, 1859, M. Lescaubault, a village physician of Orgères, Eure-et-Loire, France, saw or fancied that he saw a small dark planet-like body pass across the sun's disc. In September the alleged discovery reached Leverrier, who eagerly grasped it, as he had previously come to the conclusion that the motions of Mercury were affected by the perturbation of a planet between it and the sun. He even went so far as hypothetically to calculate the elements of the new planet. M. Liais stated that he was examining the sun at the very moment of M. Lescaubault's supposed discovery, and was certain that no dark body passed across the disc. The planet was called by anticipation Vulcan, but its existence still remains unconfirmed. (Dunkin: Midnight Sky.)

Vul-cā-nī-an, a. [Lat. Vulcanus, from Vulcanus = Vulcan.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Pertaining to Vulcan; formed by Vulcan.

"The Vulcanian panoply which Achilles lent to his teacher Triodan."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vii.

2. Of or pertaining to volcanoes; volcanic.

II. Geol.: Of, pertaining, or relating to the geological theory of the Vulcanists.

vul-cān-īo, a. [Eng. Vulcan; -īo.]

1. Of or pertaining to Vulcan.

2. Volcanic; vulcanian.

vul-cān-īo-ī-tīy, s. [Eng. vulcanic; -īty.]

The quality or state of being volcanic or volcanic; volcanic power or action; volcanicity.

vul-cān-īsm, s. [Eng. Vulcan; -īsm.]

Geol.: A collective term for the phenomena due to internal fire or heat, as volcanoes, hot springs, &c.

"A grander phase of vulcanism than that now displayed either by Vesuvius or Hecla."—Chambers' Journal, Feb. 27, 1856.

vul-cān-īst, s. [Lat. Vulcanus = (1) the god of fire; (2) fire.]

Geol.: One who attributed to igneous agency the formation of various rocks, notably basalt, &c., supposed by the Neptunists, led by Werner (1750-1817), to have been deposited from a chaotic aqueous fluid. The controversy became vehement, and the two parties degenerated into warring factions, the Vulcanist hypothesis ultimately holding the field. Called also Plutonists. [GEOLOGY, I.; EUTONIAN-THEORY, WERNERIAN.]

"The bitter controversies of the Neptunists and Vulcanists."—Brown: Our Earth & its Story, I. 99.

vul-cān-īte, s. [Eng. vulcan; -īte.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A hard and non-elastic variety of vulcanized rubber, used for making combs, dental plates, and numerous other objects. It contains from 30 to 60 per cent. more sulphur, and is subjected to a higher and more prolonged heat in curing than ordinary vulcanized rubber. It is of a brownish-black colour, is hard and tough, cuts easily, is susceptible of a good polish, and is not affected by water or any of the other caustic solvents. It evolves a considerable amount of electricity when rubbed, and is hence much used in the construction of electric machines.

2. Petrol.: A name sometimes given to Pyroxene (q.v.).

vul-cān-ī-zā-tion, s. [Eng. vulcaniz(e); -ation.]

The act or process of vulcanizing, or of treating caoutchouc or india-rubber with some form of sulphur, to effect certain changes in its properties, as to render it insensible to atmospheric changes, increase its durability, and adapt it for various purposes in the arts. This was originally effected by dipping the rubber in melted sulphur, and heating it to nearly 300°. Several other methods have been employed. The substance thus formed is elastic at all temperatures, cannot be dissolved by the ordinary solvents, and resists the effects of heat within a considerable range of temperature. Vulcanized india rubber is largely used for many useful purposes, as for waterproofing cloth, for boots, shoes, mats, toys, belting, buffers, wheel-tires, washers, valves, pipes, fire-hose, medical and surgical appliances, &c. [VULCANITE.]

vul-cān-īze, v.t. [Eng. vulcan; -īze.]

To treat by the process of vulcanization, as india-rubber.

vul-cān-īzed, pa. par. & a. [VULCANIZE.]

vulcanized india rubber, s. India-rubber subjected to the process of vulcanization (q.v.).

vul-cān-īz-ēr, s. [Eng. vulcaniz(e); -er.]

One who or that which vulcanizes; specifically, the apparatus used in vulcanizing india-rubber.

vul-cā-nō, s. [VOLCANO.]

vul-cān-ō-ğist, s. [Eng. vulcanology; -ist.] One who studies or is versed in vulcanology; a volcanist.

vul-cān-ōl-ō-ğy, s. [Eng. vulcano = a volcano; suff. -ology.]

Physics: That department of natural science which concerns itself with igneous phenomena, as volcanoes, hot springs, &c.

"Under Vulcanology he treats of the volcanic eruptions during the two years."—Nature, Oct. 22, 1885, p. 609.

vul-gate, s. [Lat. vulgatus = general, common, pa. par. of vulgo = to make common, general, or universal; vulgo = a crowd, the public.]

Biblical Versions: The most celebrated and most widely diffused version of the Bible into the Latin language. It is believed to have been made by St. Jerome, who was born in Dalmatia A.D. 329, and died at Bethlehem A.D. 420. The early Church aeneas for a considerable time to have consisted mainly of members who spoke Greek, and the necessity for a Latin version of the Scriptures was first felt in Northern Africa. One or more Latin translations were made in that quarter, which after a time were superseded by the Italian Version (q.v.). In 383 Pope Damasus urged Jerome to revise the Latin version of the New Testament by the Greek original. Undertaking the work, he found innumerable false readings, interpolations, and corruptions, and though he acted cautiously to avoid alarming the ignorant and the timid, his version was a great advance on its predecessor. He next revised the Latin version of the Old Testament by the aid of the Greek Septuagint. Finally acquiring the Hebrew tongue after he was forty-five years of age, he translated the Old Testament directly from the original language. Although his version had at first to encounter the hostile clamours of the ignorant, it made way by its own merits, without much assistance from authority, through the whole Latin-speaking portion of ancient Christendom. Gradually, however, the text was corrupted, and recensions became needless. One was commenced A.D. about 862 by Alenin at the instance of Charlemagne, a second by Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. about 1089, and there were others. The invention of printing led to the immediate issue about 1455 of the Mazarin Vulgate, printed at Mainz by Gutenberg and Fust, others following at intervals. In 1546 a commission appointed by the Council of Trent reported that the text of the Vulgate was very corrupt. In 1557 an edition of the Vulgate appeared, the proof-sheets of which were partly corrected by Pope Sixtus V., who used his authority to procure acceptance for the work. But further study showed that many of the attempted emendations were erroneous, and there was a further revision by Toletus under the auspices of Pope Clement VIII. It was issued in 1592, and is the authorised edition in the Roman Church. It bears the name of both pontiffs, being entitled "Biblia Sacra Latina Vulgate editionis Sixti V. et Clementis VIII." Wycliffe's version of the Bible was made from the Vulgate; and thus that version has affected the Authorised version, as it has those published in the languages of Western Europe. A large number of the theological terms now in use, such as "sacrament," "justification," &c., have been adopted from the Latin of the Vulgate.

"The Latin Church found in the Vulgate an instrument for reaching all hearts and guiding all tongues."
—J. S. Brewer: English Studies, p. 345.

4. Hence sometimes applied to the ordinary text of any author.

"Let us pass from 'The Tempest' to the 'Comedy of Errors' v. II. 'My heavy burden are delivered.' So the folio, and rightly. The vulgate gives 'burdens,' replicating the plural."
—Notes & Queries, May 19, 1888, p. 382.

vulned, a. [Lat. vulnus = a wound.]

Her.: An epithet applied to any animal that is wounded and bleeding; as, a hind's head vulned.

vũl'-tũr, s. [Lat. = a vulture (q.v.)]

Ornith.: Vulture (q.v.); the type-genus of Vulturine, with one species, Vultur monachus, ranging over Spain and North Africa, through Nepal to China, north of Ningpo. Bill moderate, thick, higher than broad, hooked; nostrils in cere, naked, vertical; wings long; tail moderate, rounded; tarsi strong, reticulated, with small scales.

vũl'-tũre, s. [Lat. vultur = a vulture, lit. = a plucker or tearer, from the same root as vello (pa. t. vulsi) = to pluck, to tear.]

1. Lit. & Ornith.: A popular name for any species of the Vulturidae (q.v.). They are large birds of repulsive habits and appearance, but extremely useful, since they perform the office of scavengers in the warm countries which they inhabit. They feed on the ground, where they walk with comparative ease, their large feet being well fitted for progression. Unlike eagles, they do not carry food to their young, but devour the carrion and feed their nestlings by regurgitating food from their crop. It has long been a vexed question as to whether they discover their prey by sight or by smell, and experiments show that they possess both senses in an extraordinary degree, but the balance of evidence goes to prove that they generally find their food by sight. The chief species are: The Black Vulture (Vultur monachus), the Griffon or Fulvous Vulture (Cyps fulvus), the Sociable or Eared Vulture (Otogyss auricularis), the Nubian Vulture (O. nubicus), the Egyptian Vulture (Neophron percnopterus), and the King Vulture (Sarcophagus papa). The Condor (S. gryphus) of South America is the greatest of the vultures. In the United States the family is represented by the well-known and common Turkey Vulture, or Turkey Buzzard (Chalartes aura).

GRIFFON VULTURE.

2. Fig.: A person of a rapacious disposition. "Ye dress of business, vultures amongst men, That fly upon the hearts of generous spirits."—Beaumont & Fletcher: Honest Man's Fortune, II.

3. Scripture:

(1) Heb. דַּיְיָהָא (dayyah), דַּאָהָא (daah). Probably not a real vulture, but a species of Kite, perhaps Milvus oler. (Lev. xi. 14; Deut. xiv. 13; Isc. xxxiv. 15.)

(2) אֲרָיָה (ayyah). Probably Milvus regalis. (Job xxviii. 7.)

vũl'-tũr-ĩ-dũe, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vultur; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idũe.]

Ornith.: Vultures; a family of Accipitres, with two sub-families, Vulturinae and Sarcophaginae (both which see). Bill moderate, culmen straight at base, constricted in front of cere, curved towards the tip; upper mandible with margin sinuate; nostrils with a bony septum; tarsi reticulate, sometimes hirsute or semi-hirsute; middle toe the longest, outer toes conjoined at base by a membrane; claws slightly curved, obtuse. In most of the species the head and upper part of the neck are naked or beset with scattered plumules; eyes surrounded by the flattened face, not placed in a depression under exert plumæ.

vũ-ĩng, pr. par. & a. [VIE.]

vũ-ĩng-ĩly, adv. [Eng. vying; -ly.] In a vying manner; emulously.

W.

W. the twenty-third letter of the English alphabet. It takes its form and its name from the union of two V's, the character V having formerly the name and force of U. [U, V.] The name "double u" is not, however, a very suitable one, being given to the letter from its form or composition, and not from its sound. In the Anglo-Saxon alphabet W had a distinctive character of its own, the modern letter being adopted in the thirteenth century. W represents two sounds: (1) the distinctive sound properly belonging to it, being that which it has at the beginning of a syllable, and when followed by a vowel, as in was, woe, wood, forward, housework, &c.; (2) at the end of syllables, in which position it is always preceded by a vowel, it has either no force at all (or at most only serves to lengthen the vowel), as in law, paw, grow, lawful, &c., or it forms the second element in a diphthong, as in few, new, now, vow, &c., being in such cases really a vowel, and equivalent to the u in bough, neutral, &c. It is formed by opening the mouth with a close, circular configuration of the lips, the organs having exactly the same position as they have in pronouncing the oo in foot. W is hence often spoken of as a vowel; but it is not so, as may be seen by comparing wool, wood, and woman, in which w is not equivalent to oo. W is now silent in many words and positions: (1) in words, as in gunwale, boatswain, answer, sword, two, twopenny, &c.; (2) when initial and followed by r, as in wrap, write, wrong, &c. (It is, however, still sounded in this position in Scotland.) The initial wh, in Anglo-Saxon, hw, as in who (A.S. hwa), whelp (A.S. hwelp), had originally a guttural sound, as seen in the Scotch ghat = what, ghen = when, &c. It represents the cognate Icelandic hv, and Latin initial gu. In Scotland, at the present day, a very decided guttural sound is heard in such words as what, whale, &c., and in Aberdeen the guttural has become f, as in fat = what. In English pronunciation, in initial wh, the w is silent in who, whom; in other words it is generally pronounced with a slight aspiration after it, as in when, what, which, though there is often a tendency to suppress the h and pronounce whure and simple. The Anglo-Saxon initial sound wh has become simple f, as in lisp; A.S. vulsp. W has disappeared vũl, bũy, pũt, jũwĩ; cat, gell, chorus, qũn, bench; go, gem; thin, thĩs; sin, aq; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f

-cian, -man = shũn. -tion, -cion = shũn; -řion, -řion = zhũn. -cious, -tious, -sious = shũs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bũl, dũl from some words, as from ooss = A.S. wós; four = A.S. feower; tree = A.S. treow; know = A.S. knéow. It has crept into whole and its derivatives = A.S. hal, hol: so whoop = Fr. houper. It has disappeared from the combinations, tw, thw, and sw, as tush = A.S. túsg; thong = A.S. thung; sister = A.S. swíster; swaster; such = A.S. swita. It represents v in periwinkle = Fr. periwinkle, Lat. periwinkle; and g in law = A.S. lagu; saw = A.S. sage; dawn = A.S. dagian; marrow = A.S. meary, &c.; so wader = O. Fr. gaffre, goffre, Lat. gafrum. Coming before an a, this v often gives the vowel an o sound, as in wallow, &c.

W. As an initial, is used for West, as in charts: W.S.W. = West-South-West, &c.

W. As a symbol, is used:
In chem.: For the element Tungsten (Wolfram).

wāg-ēr, * wa-jōr, s. [O. Fr. wageure, gagure, from Low Lat. wadiature, from wadiatus, pa. par. of wadio = to wage (q.v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Something deposited, staked, or hazarded on the event of a contest or some unsettled question; something staked by each of two persons in support of his own opinion concerning a future or an unknown event; a stake. The party whose opinion proves to be correct receives what has been staked by both. By statutes of England, Scotland, and the United States, all contracts or agreements, whether in writing or parole, depending on wagers, are null and void, and the wager or money due thereon cannot be recovered in a court of law. A wager lost is, therefore, only a debt of honor.

"For most men (till by losing rendered sager) Will back their own opinions with a wager."
Byron: Beppo, xviii.

2. An occasion upon which two persons make a bet; a bet.

3. That on which bets are laid; the subject of a bet.

B. Intrans.: To make a wager or wagers; to bet.

* wāg-ēr-ēr, s. One who wagers or bets.

wāg-ēr-īng, pr. par. or a. [WAGER, v.]

wagering policy, s. [POLICY (2), s., †.]

wāg-ēr, s. pl. [WAGE, s.] The payment for work done or services performed; the price paid for labor; the return made or compensation paid to those employed to perform any kind of labor or service for their employers.

¶ Some economists have held that the rate of wages is determined by the ratio which the capital—bears to the productive use of which labor is sought—bears to the number of laborers seeking that kind of employment; that when the capital increases more rapidly than the laboring population of a country, wages rise; when it increases more slowly, they fall. It has also been noted that the effect of a rise in wages is to produce an increase in the number of marriages and, in due time, of population, with the result of ultimately causing wages again to fall. A simpler theory is that labor is really a sort of commodity, and subject to the laws of commodity, which are immutable (vide infra). This view will account for the fact that all attempts to fix wages by law have proved ineoperative and mischievous, a conspicuous example being the effort made, in the reign of Edward III. (1350), on the part of capitalists, after the Black Death (in 1346) had swept away so large a part of the population, both in Britain and on the continent, that wages naturally and greatly rose. In the United States it has been considered highly desirable to preserve American mechanics from open competition with the poorly paid labor of Europe, and the protectionists claim that the American tariff system furnishes such protection to American labor. However true this may be, the fact remains that this system has not prevented frequent and extensive strikes proceeding from the reduction of wages; and the question of the relations of capital and labor is still one of vital significance in American economics.

"The produce of labor constitutes the natural recompense or wages of labor."—Adam Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. i., chap. viii.

Practically, however, labor is treated as a commodity, and, therefore, the price of labor (wages) is subject to the influence of the natural law of commodity affecting the supply of and the demand for laborers; and if, through low wages, capital (which is an employing agent but not a productive factor in economics) shall absorb an undue proportion of "the produce of labor," Mr. Smith's idea of "natural recompense" must prove ineoperative. It seems clear that our recurrent labor troubles may be ascribed to this cause, at least in part. [See CAPITAL, s., B. 3. †.]

¶ Although a plural, wages sometimes has the verb in the singular.

"The wages of sin is death."—Romans vi. 23.

¶ Strictly speaking, the term wages comprehends as well the pay of officers, the fees of lawyers, medical men, &c., the salary of clerks, the stipends of clergymen, as the remuneration for mechanical and menial labor.

Polit. Econ.: A term formerly used to denote that portion of active capital devoted to the payment of wages; being, in fact, simply the aggregate sum of wages, and not a fund in any sense. Now little used.

Compos.: Phosphoric acid, 43.8; magnesia, 37.1; fluorine, 11.7; magnesium, 7.4 = 100 = to the formula (MgO)₂PO₄ + MgF.

wāg-ōn, wāg-gōn, s. [Dnt. wagen, cogn. with A.S. wagn = a wain (q.v.); Icel. & Sw. wagn; O. H. Ger. wagan.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A four-wheeled vehicle for the transport of goods, freight, and produce. The ordinary goods wagon is a strong, heavy vehicle, drawn by two horses yoked abreast. The fore-wheels are smaller than the hind-wheels, and their axle is swivelled to the body of the vehicle, so as to facilitate turning. Most wagons are supplied with strong springs on account of the weight of the vehicle, and to make up for the absence of the steadying power of the horses, who expend their force in pulling only, the weight being distributed over the four wheels. A vehicle on four wheels of equal diameter is of lighter draught than one in which the fore-wheels are smaller than the hind-wheels, unless the load is distributed on the wheels in proportion to their diameter. Wagons are used for many purposes, agricultural and commercial. Those used to carry goods needing protection from rain are provided with wooden bows, over which is stretched a covering of heavy canvas or other material. The ends of the bows are inserted in staples on each side of the vehicle, so that cover and bows can be removed when not required.

"One of the wheels of the wagon wherin I was broke, so that by that means the other wagons went

Wä-hä-bi, Wä-hä-beë, s. [Named after Abdul-Wahhab = the servant of Him who gives everything.]

Muhammadanism (Pl.): A sect founded by Abdul Wahhab, born towards the end of the seventeenth century, near Der'ayah, the capital of Nejd, in Arabia. During the Saracen period the Muhammadan sacred places were in Arab custody. When the Saracens were succeeded by the Turkish power they passed over into Turkish keeping. It is obligatory on every Musalman who can afford the expense, to make a pilgrimage to Mecca at least once in his life. The Arabs were greatly scandalized by the moral laxity of some of the pilgrims, and it became painfully apparent that even the best of them had largely departed from the purity of the faith, according to divine honours to Muhammad, elevating tradition to the same level as revealed scripture, and quietly ignoring self-denial for its performance. Abdul Wahhab felt it a duty to make a determined effort to restore Muhammadanism to its pristine purity, and the most earnest Moslems gradually became his followers. Converting to his views Muhammad ibn Saud, the powerful Sheikh of Der'ayah, whose daughter he married, he induced his father-in-law to draw the sword for the establishment of a pure Muhammadan theocracy. The Belouins flocked to his standard; the towns of Arabia, less inclined to adopt the new faith, had to be conquered. The Pasha of Bagdad, A.D. 1748 and 1749, somewhat retarded, but did not permanently arrest their progress. In A.D. 1765 (1172 of the Hegira), the father-in-law died, and on June 14, 1787 (A. H. 1206), the revivalist or reformer. The former was succeeded by his son, Abdul-Aziz. In 1797 the Wahabees pillaged the town and tomb of Hussein; in 1803 they captured Mecca, and in 1804 Medina, where they plundered the tomb of Muhammad himself. By this time Abdul-Aziz had been succeeded by his son Saud, by whose orders the Khoobia (public prayer) was no longer allowed to be offered in the name of the Sultan. With the exception of the territory subject to the Imam of Muscat, all Arabia now submitted to the Wahabees. They also captured some Arabic towns on the coast of Persia, and Wahaboe pirates infested the Persian Gulf. In 1809 these pirates were severely punished by the British, in conjunction with the Imami of Muscat. The same year Mehemet Ali, Pasha of Egypt, prepared to attack them. In 1812 he took Medina, and in 1813 Mecca. In 1816 Ibrahim Pasha, the son of Mehemet Ali, assumed the command of the Egyptian troops, and, entering Arabia, took Der'ayah in 1818, and capturing Abdullah, son and successor of Saud, sent him to Constantinople, where he was beheaded. In 1827, 1834, 1838, and 1839 the Wahabees attempted to excite insurrection, and required continual vigilance from Egypt. In 1862 and 1863 Palgrave found them numerous in Arabia. The Wahabee movement is not now confined to Arabia; it has spread throughout the Muhammadan world, and though quiescent at present, still possesses vigorous life, and will doubtless again from time to time break forth. Many adherents of the sect are believed to exist in India, Patna being considered one of their strongholds.

wake (1), s. [A.S. wacu, in comp. niht-wacu = a night-wake.]

*1. The act of waking or of being awake; the state of not sleeping or of being awake.

"Making such difference twixt wake and sleep." Shakep.: 1 Henry IV., lll. 1.

*2. The state of forbearing sleep, especially for a solemn or religious or festive purpose; a vigil; specif., the feast of the dedication of a parish church, kept by watching all night. Each church on its consecration was dedicated to some particular saint, and when the anniversary of the day of consecration came round, the parish wake was held; and in many parishes a second wake was held on the birthday of the saint. Tents were erected in the churchyard to supply refreshments to the crowd on the morrow, which was kept as a public holiday. The original motive of devotion and reverence was soon lost at these meetings, which degenerated into mere fairs or markets, characterized by merry-making, and often disgraced by riot and dissipation; hence the term came to mean merry-making generally; a festive gathering.

"Some pretty fellow, With a clean strength that cracks a cudgell well, And dances at a wake, and plays at nine-holes." Beaum. & Flou.: Captain, l. 2.

3. The watching of a dead body prior to burial by the friends and neighbours of the deceased. Such a custom was formerly prevalent in Scotland, and is still common in Ireland. It probably originated in a superstitious notion with respect to the danger of a dead body being carried off by some of the agents of the invisible world, or exposed to the ravages of brute animals. Though professedly held for the indulgence of reverential sorrow, wakes are too often converted into drunken and riotous orgies.

"The first time I knew him was at my mother's wake." Croker: Fairy Legends of Ireland, p. 60.

1. A row of green damp grass. (Prov.)

2. The track left by a ship in the water, formed by the meeting of the water, which rushes from each side to fill the space made by the ship in passing through it. This track can be seen to a considerable distance behind the ship's stern, being smoother than the rest of the sea.

"In a storm they will hover close under the ship's stern, in the wake of the ship (as 'tis called) or the smoothness which the ship's passing has made on the sea." Dampier: Voyages (an. 1699).

3. A track generally; a line following something else.

"A torpedo could be sent so closely in the wake of another as to take instant advantage of the opening made in the netting." Daily Telegraph, Sept. 25, 1884.

wake'-ful, *wäko'-füll, a. [Eng. wake (1), s.; -ful.]

1. Watchful, vigilant.

2. Keeping awake, not sleeping; not disposed to sleep.

"All night long I lie Tossing and turning." Matthew Arnold: Sohrab & Rustum.

*3. Rousing from, or as from sleep.

"The wakeful trump of doom must thunder through the deep." Milton: Ode on the Nativity.

wake'-ful-ly, adv. [Eng. wakeful; -ly.] In a wakeful manner; with watching or watchfulness.

"To have care of the watch, which he knew his own fear would wake him very wakefully perform." Sidney: Arcadia, bk. 111.

Wāl-dēn'-sēs, Val-dēn'-sēs, s. pl. [Named from Peter Waldo, their alleged founder, born at Vaux (Lat. Valdium) on the Rhone, early in the twelfth century.]

Church Hist.: A sect which for many centuries has maintained its independence of the Church of Rome, from which it differs in tenets and government. Its chief seats have long been in the three high valleys of Piedmont, situated in the Cottian Alps, on the Italian side of the main chain, but so near the great pass between France and Italy, that French as well as Italian is spoken in the valleys. They claim to have arisen in apostolic times, maintaining an unbroken succession of bishops, but the claim is unfounded, and they probably derived their origin from Peter Waldo [see etym.], a rich merchant of Lyons, and deeply pious man, who at first had no desire to depart from the tenets of the Roman Church, but simply aimed at deepening the religious feeling of its adherents. He was ultimately brought into collision with the Church authorities when, in and after 1160, he had the four gospels translated from Latin into French, and adopted the view that it was lawful for laymen to preach. His opinions spread rapidly; his followers, like himself, not at first greatly differing in doctrine from the Church of Rome. According to Combe (Hist. de Vaudois d'Italie) they had no distinctive Waldensian literature, nor any wide religious influence, until after they had been influenced by the teaching of Wycliffe and his disciple Huss. [Hussites.] M. Montet (Histoire Littéraire des Vaudois) divides Waldensian literature into three periods: (1) The Catholic period, during which the dogmas and practices of the Church were accepted. (2) The Hussite period, in which the Pope is fiercely attacked, the Sacraments are invalid by reason of the wickedness of the priests, and there is a strong leaning towards the Universal Priesthood. (3) The Calvinistic period, marked by falsification of documents, forgery, and mutilation, with the object of showing that the Waldensian is a Christian body which had descended from Apostolic times, preserving their faith through the ages in primitive form. This fiction M. Montet has destroyed, though, as he acknowledges, the late Mr. Henry Bradshaw had already exposed the real character of some of the documents adduced. After the Reformation, persecution, which had already been directed against them became more fierce. Numbers were slain by Francis I. of France, in 1545 and 1546, by the Duke of Savoy in 1579, and by Charles Emmanuel II. in 1655. Other persecutions followed in 1663, 1664, and 1686, great sympathy for the sufferers being shown by Protestant nations, especially by England during the Protectorate. Gradually the Waldensians obtained toleration; on December 15, 1853, they received permission from Victor Emmanuel II. to erect a church in Turin, and it is probable that they will unite with the Free Church of Italy. The services are of the plainest type of Geneva Protestantism, the people only joining in the occasional singing of a hymn.

¶ Walker! or Hokey Walker! A slang exclamation of incredulity, when a story is told or a statement made which is known or believed to be false. The origin of the expression is much disputed, and was discussed at length in Notes & Queries. There are three explanations of the phrase: (1) That many years ago there was an aquiline-nosed Jew named Walker, a popular lecturer on astronomy, who, telescope in hand, invited his pupils to "take a sight" at the moon and stars. The phrase struck his schoolboy auditory, who frequently "took a sight" with the gesture of outstretched arm and adjustment to nose and eye; (2) that Hokey Walker was a London magistrate of dreaded acuteness and incredulity, whose hooked nose gave the title of "beak" to all his successors; (3) that John Walker was an out-door clerk in a business house in Chesapeake, "Old Jack," who had a hooked nose, was a spy upon the employés, who were always throwing discredit on his reports, so that in time his word was disbelieved and his occupation ceased. (Slang Dict.)

O. Dut. walnoot; Icel. walnöt; Dan. valnød; Sw. valnöt; Ger. walnusz, walsche nuss.]

A. As substantive:

1. Bot.: Any species or tree of the genus Juglans. There are seven or eight species in all, the best known being the Black Walnut (Juglans nigra) of the United States, and the Common Walnut (J. regia), a native of Asia. The Black Walnut is a large and beautiful tree, its trunk being sometimes six or seven feet in diameter, while its timber is of the highest value for cabinet manufacture. The fruit is inferior to that of J. regia. Another common species of this country is the Butter-nut (J. cinerea), a much smaller tree, which bears an elongated nut, covered with a viscid substance. Sugar is obtained from the sap of this tree, as from that of the maple. The inner bark is mildly cathartic. The leaves, rubbed to powder, are useful for blistering. J. regia is a large tree, which bears an excellent fruit, and has long been cultivated in Europe. It has been introduced into this country, and is highly valued for its wood, which was held to be the best known till mahogany was discovered, and is still exceedingly prized for gunstocks, though it is now imported into Europe for this purpose from Asia.

2. Comm.: The wood of the walnut-tree; it is of great value as a cabinet and furniture material, being very durable, and taking a fine polish.

B. As adj.: Made of the wood of the walnut-tree: as, a walnut table.

walnut-oil, s. The oil obtained from the albumen of the seed of the walnut-tree by reducing them to a pulp, and subjecting them to pressure, first with and then without heat. In Cashmere the oil is largely used in cookery and as an illuminant, but in Europe it is not much employed for food, the taste being offensive to many persons.

walnut-tree, s. [WALNUT, A. 1.]

walnut-wood, s. & a.

A. As subst.: The wood of the walnut-tree (q.v.).

B. As adj.: Made of the wood of the walnut-tree: as, a walnut-wood table.

wäl-pürg-ine, wäl-pürg-ite (w as v), s. [After the Walpurgis-tide, in which it was found; suff. -ine, -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A trichlorine mineral, occurring in thin, scale-like crystals, with various other uranium compounds, at the Weisser Hirsch mine, near Schneeberg, Saxony. Sp. gr. 5.8; lustre, somewhat adamantine to greasy; colour, wax-yellow. Compos.: a hydrated arsenate of bismuth and uranium, with the suggested formula $4R_2O_3AsO_4 + 6H_2O$, in which R_2O_3 = the oxides of bismuth and uranium.

Wäl-pürg-is (W as V), s. [See compound.]

Walpürgis-night, s. The eve of May 1, which has become associated with some of the most popular witch superstitions of Germany, though its connection with Walpurgis, Walpurga, or Walburga, a female saint of the eighth century, is not satisfactorily accounted for, her feast falling properly on Feb. 25. On this night the witches were supposed to ride on broomsticks and he-goats to some appointed rendezvous, such as the highest point of the Hartz Mountains or the Brocken, where they held high festival with their master, the devil.

wäl-rüs, s. [Orig. from Scandinavian; cogn. with Sw. valross; Dan. hvalros; Icel. (in an inverted form) hross-hvalr = a horse-whale, the name being given (it is suggested) from the noise made by the animal sometimes resembling a neigh; A.S. hors-wahal = horse-whale, a walrus. (Skeat.)]

Zool.: Trichechus rosmarus; called also the Morse, Sea-horse, and Sea-cow. The Walrus is now confined to the regions within the Arctic Circle, though its extinct ancestors had a much wider geographical range. It is a large carnivorous marine mammal, ordinarily from ten to twelve feet long, with a girth of nearly as much. "It is said that it sometimes attains a length of twenty feet" (Van Haven); muzzle abruptly truncated, with long and remarkably strong bristly moustaches; small eyes; external ear wanting, though the orifice is distinctly visible; body large and sack-like, tapering towards the tail; hind limbs short, connected by a membrane which covers the wail, fore limbs strong and stumpy, all with five digits. The hide is of a tawny-brown colour, with difficulty penetrated by bullets, and has been likened to a tough, flexible coat of mail. The upper canines are developed in adults of both sexes into immense tusks, each from fifteen inches to two feet long, and weighing ten pounds and upwards. In some individuals the points converge towards and in others they diverge from each other. This was one reason why Freneyer wished to adopt two species; but Snuedvall has shown that scarcely two skulls can be examined without minute differences in the size and direction of the tusks being perceived. The most important function of these tusks is digging shell-fish, the favourite food of the walrus, out of the banks and mud of shoal-water. They are also employed to raise the body out of the water, by digging them into ice-floes, which probably gave rise to the legend of the Rosmarine (q.v.); and they form terrible weapons of offence, as by a quick turn whilst those of the main body sleep, and when danger threatens the sentinels wake the others by bellowing. They are said to be monogamous, and the female brings forth at nine months one calf, usually on the ice-floes. In disposition they are quiet and inoffensive, unless attacked or during the love-season, or if their young are in danger, when they become desperately aggressive, and furiously attack the hunters on the ice or in their boats. The area of the walrus and its numbers, owing to reckless slaughter by sealers and whalers, are fast decreasing, and the few remaining seek unfrequented spots in high latitudes inaccessible to sealers. At one time there was a considerable trade in walrus-hunting, but it is now at a very low ebb: the tusks alone have any commercial value at the present time; but formerly walrus-hides were used for various purposes, such as machine-bands, &c. A living specimen was brought alive to Holland in 1812; and two specimens have been procured for the Zoological Gardens, Regent's Park, London, but both died soon after being brought to their new quarters.

wail, a. [A.S. wealt = unsteady; unwealt = steady, from wealtan = to roll.]

wail-tÿ, a. [Eng. walt, a.; -ÿ.] Unsteady, crank. (Said of a vessel.)

waltz, s. [A shortened form of Ger. walzen = a jig, a waltz, from walzen = to roll, to revolve, to waltz; cogn. with A.S. wealtan = to roll, to twist.]

Music:

1. A dance said to have originated in Bohemia, now of almost universal adoption. It is performed by couples, who, almost embracing each other, swing round the room with a whirling motion. It was introduced into England in 1813.

2. The music composed for such a dance. The time is of triple measure in crotchets or quavers, and consists of eight or sixteen bar phrases. Modern waltz-writers frequently add to the original dance-form an introduction and coda. The "Vienna" waltz is characterized by a rapid movement and strict unbroken time. Ländler are slower and more dignified than the waltz. "Classical waltzes" are compositions in waltz-form intended for set pieces, not for dance tunes. In them greater scope is given to the composer and performer than is compatible with the rhythm of the dance.

waltz, v.t. [WALTZ, s.]
 1. To dance a waltz.
 2. To move as in a waltz; to trip.

¶ The Wanderer Jew: A legendary character, condemned to wander from place to place till the Day of Judgment. According to one version, that of Matthew Paris (Chron.
St. Alban's Abbey), he was Cartophilus, the doorkeeper of the Judgment Hall, in the service of Pontius Pilate, and struck our Lord as he led him forth, saying, "Get on faster, Jesus!" whereupon our Lord replied, "I am going, but thou shalt tarry till I come again."
Another legend is that Jesus, pressed down with the weight of his cross, stopped to rest at the door of one Ahasuerus, a cobbler. The craftsman pushed him away, saying, "Get off! Away with you, away!" Our Lord replied, "Truly I go away, and that quickly, but tarry thou till I come." A third legend says that it was the cobbler who hailed Jesus before the judgment seat of Pilate, saying to him, "Faster, Jesus, faster!" The legend has formed the basis of many poems and novels.

wandering-albatross, s.

Ornith.: Diomedea exilans. [ALBATROSS.]

wān-dēr-oo', wān-dēr-ŭ', s. [Fr. Ouan-derou, from wanderu, the Cingalese form of Hind. bandar = a monkey.]

Zoology:

1. Macacus silenus, from the south of Hin-dostan, especially the country bordering the Malabar coast. It is about two feet in length, tail ten to twelve inches. The Wanderoo has long, slim bodies, covered with deep-black hair, tail of the same colour, tufted.
The head looks very large, because of a mane,

(WANDEROO. (Macacus silenus.)

or ruff, and beard which sticks out round the face. This mass of long hair is either gray or white, and adds to the airy look of the broad face, soft dull eyes, and broad muzzle. The name is misleading, as Macacus silenus is not a native of Ceylon. Mr. Blanford (Proc. Zool.
Soc., 1887, p. 623) proposed to substitute for it the name Lion-tailed Monkey, used by Pennant.

2. Any species of the genus Semnopithecus
(q.v.). S. ursinus is the Great Wanderoo
[MAHA.]

"The name wanderu has clung to the Malabar Monkey ever since (the publication of Buffon's Nat.
Hist.); but really applies, as Templeton, Kelsart,
Tennant, and others have shown, to the Ceylonese Semnopithec, and was rightly employed for those animals by Knox and Eay."—Proc. Zool. Soc. 1887,
p. 623.

"Mr. Hutchins, in his manuscript observations on the habits of birds in the Hudson's Bay territory, says of his 'Spotted Owl' or 'Hapapetha,' that it 'makes a nest in the dry grounds, and lays from five to ten eggs in May. . . I think they cannot be much doubt that it was the Snowy Owl.'" wăp-a-tođ, s. [WAPPATOG.] * waped, a. [AWHAPE.] Cruahed by misery; downcast, dejected, rueful.

wă-pen-shăw, wa-pin-schăw, s. [Lit. a weapon-show.] An appearance or review of persons under arms, made formerly at certain times in every district. These exhibitions, or meetings, were not designed for military exercises, but only for showing that the lieges were properly provided with arms. The name has been revived in some quarters, and applied to the periodical gatherings of the volunteer corps of a more or less wide district for review, inspection, shooting competitions, and the like. (Scotch.)

wă-pen-tăke, wă-pen-tăe, s. [A.S. wapentake (dat.) = a district, a wapentake, nom. wapentaca, wapentaca; Low Lat. wa-pentac, wapentagium, from Icel. rýpnataka = a wapont-taking or touching; hence, a vote of consent as expressed, and, lastly, a subdivision of a shire in the Danish part of England corresponding to the hundred in other parts; from icel. vagn, genit. pl. of vagn = a weapon, and ta = a taking, a hold, a grasp, from taka = to take, to seize, to grasp, to touch. The name is derived from the custom of the chiefs of a particular district meeting on a certain day at a specified spot, when the head chief, alighting from his horse, raised his spear in the air, and the inferior chiefs, also on foot, touched this spear with their lances, and so acknowledged their fealty. A name formerly given in some of the northern shires of England, and still retained in Yorkshire, to a territorial division of the county corresponding to the hundred of the southern counties.

The hundred and the wapentake is all one, as I read in some, and by this division not a name appropriate to a set number of townes (for then all hundreds should be of equal quantity) but a limited jurisdiction. — Holinshed: Descript. Eng., bk. II, ch. IV.

wāp-i-tī, a. [North Amer. Indian.]

Zool.: Cervus canadensis, a native of North America, ranging from Carolina to 56-57° N. latitude. It is closely allied to, but considerably larger than the Stag (q.v.), standing about fifty-four inches at the shoulder. Yellowish brown on upper parts; sides gray, long coarse hair in front of neck, like a dewlap; antlers large, brow-line duplicated. It frequents low grounds, or woody tracts near savannahs or marshes. The venison is of little value, as it is coarse and dry; but the hide makes excellent leather. Called also, but erroneously, the Elk and Gray Moose.

wāpp, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Naut.: A leader on the end of a pendant, acting as a fair-leader.

wāp-pa-toō, s. [See def.]

Bot.: The name given by the Indians of north-western America to: (1) the tubers of Sagittaria littoralis, which they eat; (2) to the potato. (Treas. of Bot.)

wāppe, s. [WAPPET.]

*wāp-pēned, a. [See def.] A word only found in the passage given below, and of doubtful origin and meaning; one suggestion is that it is connected with wap, in the old sense of, to have sexual intercourse. A proposed emendation is wappered (q.v.).

"This [gold] it is That makes the wappered widow wed again." Shakespeare: Timon, iv. 3.

wāp-pēr, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A name given to the smaller species of river-gudgeon.

wāp-pēr, v. t. [A freq. from wap (q.v.); Dut. wapperen = to waver, to fluctuate, to vacillate.] To move quickly and tremulously, as from natural infirmity; to totter, to twitter, to blink.

"But still he stole his face to set awry, And wapping turned up his white of eye." Mirror for Magistrates.

wapper-eyed, a. Having eyes that move in a quick, tremulous manner. (Prov.)

wāp-pēred, a. [WAPPER, v.] Restless, fatigued, worn out. (Prov.)

wāp-plēr-ite (w as v), s. [After Herr Wappler of Dresden; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: A magnesian-pharmacolite crystallizing in the triclinic system. Crystals small, sometimes in globular encrustations. Hardness, 2 to 2.5; sp. gr. 2.48; colour, white; lustre, vitreous. Compos.: a hydrated arsenate of lime and magnesia, the mean of two analyses yielding the formula 2CaOAsO₅ + 8H where some of the lime is replaced by magnesia. Found at Joachimsthal, Bohemia.

wār, *warre, *werre, *wyrrē, s. [An English word, appearing in the Laws of Canute, De Foresta, § 9. Cogn. with O. Fr. werre (Fr. guerre), from O. H. Ger. werro = vexation, strife, confusion, broil; wērren = to bring into confusion, to entangle, to embroil; O. Dan. werre = war, hostility, from werren, verwerren = to embroil, to bring into disorder or confusion; warren = to disturb, to embroil.]

1. A contest between nations and states (International War), or between parties in the same state (Civil War), carried on by force of arms, and resorted to either for purposes of advantage or of revenge. The one party possesses, or takes possession of something which the other has resolved to seize, or has inflicted some real or supposed injury on the other, which he determines to punish by the infliction of a corresponding chastisement. Formerly, war was waged at the will of despotic monarchs; now wars usually arise, in the first instance, from disputes concerning territorial possessions and frontiers, unjust dealings with the citizens of one state by another, questions of race and sentiment, jealousy of military prestige, or mere lust of conquest. Civil wars arise from the claims of rival competitors for the supreme power in a state, or for the establishment of some important point connected with civil or religious liberty. In all cases, the object of each contending party is to destroy the power of the other by defeating or dispersing his army or navy, by the occupation of some important part of his country, such as the capital, or principal administrative and commercial centres, or the ruin of his commerce, thus cutting off his sources of reparation in men, money, and material. An international or public war can only be authorized by the sovereign power of the nations, and previous to the commencement of hostilities it is now usual for the state taking the initiative to issue a declaration of war, which usually takes the form of an explanatory manifesto addressed to neutral states. An aggressive or offensive war is now carried into the territory of a hitherto friendly power; and a defensive war is one carried on to resist such aggression. Certain laws, usages, or rights of war are recognised by international law. By such laws it is allowable to seize and destroy the persons or property of armed enemies, to stop up all their channels of traffic or supply, and to appropriate everything in an enemy's country necessary for the support or subsistence of the invading army. On the other hand, though an enemy may lawfully be starved into a surrender, wounding, except in battle, mutilation, and all cruel and wanton devastation, are contrary to the usages of war, as are also the bombardment of a defenceless town, firing on a hospital, the use of poison in any way, or torture to extort information from an enemy. [SUCCESSION, ¶ (7).]

2. Any contest. "Excel us in this wordy war." Pope: Homer; Iliad xx.

3. The profession of arms; the art of war. "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." — Isaiah li. 4.

*4. Instruments of war. (Poetical.) "The god of love inhabits there, With all his rage, and dread, and grief, and care; His complement of stores and total war." Prior: (Todd).

*5. Forces, army. (Poetical.) "On their embattled ranks the waves return, And overwhelm their war." Milton: P. L., xii. 214.

6. A state of hostility or violent opposition; a hostile act or action; hostility, enmity. Turn'd wild in nature, wip by their stails, flung out, Contending 'gainst obedience, as they would Make war with man." Shakespeare: Macbeth, II. 4.

¶ The word is sometimes used in the plural form with the same signification as it has in the singular. "Is Signior Montanto returned from the wars?" Shakespeare: Much Ado, I. 1.

on estuaries, by a system of banks and sluices, by which tide-waters are retained until they have deposited their sediment, and then discharged and renewed until the whole level of the surface is permanently elevated.

"Egypt, or rather Lower Egypt, well named 'The River Land,' has been transformed from its original condition of a sandy desert by the mud-bearing Nile, which, overtopping its sources, has for ages deposited deep layers of alluvium, and created one of the most fertile countries in the world by the same process as that which, artificially produced, is called in Lincolnshire 'warping.'"—Illust. London News, July 30, 1859, p. 113.

II. Technically:

1. Anat. & Surg. (Pl.): Excrescences or small tumours on the skin, consisting of hypertrophied cutaneous papilla, either with each papilla separate and merely covered with thin cuticle, or with a bundle of them bound together by hard, scaly epithelium. They are generally conical, with a radiated structure, are hard, insensible, and darker than the surrounding parts. They may be caused by whatever irritates the skin, and may occur singly or in groups, generally on the hands or fingers; and are most common in young people. They may in general be cured by attention to cleanliness and by the application of some caustic, or may be removed by a pair of curved scissors, and the wound afterwards dressed with a lotion. Sometimes they disappear if stimulated strongly. Warts on the faces of old people, and those produced by soot on chimney-sweeps, are mostly forms of epithelial cancer. Called also Vegetations and Verrucae.

2. Bot.: [VERRUCA, L.]

wart-cross, s. Bot.: Seneciera Coronopus (= Coronopus Ruellii). So named from its wart-shaped fruit.

wart-herb, s. Bot.: Rhyncosia minima.

Zool.: A popular name for either of the species of the genus Phacochærus (q.v.), from the protuberances under the eyes. The African wart-hog (Phacochærus aethiopicus), a native of Abyssinia and the central regions of Africa, the coast of Guinea, and Mozambique, is about four feet long, with a naked, slender tail of twelve inches; it is sparsely covered with light-brown bristles, and has a long, stiff mane extending from between the ears along the neck and back. Another species (P. aethiopicus), the Vlacke Vark of the Dutch colonists at the Cape of Good Hope, inhabits the South of Africa, and differs from the first species chiefly in having the facial warts more fully developed in its peculiarly-shaped head. Both species are hunted, and their flesh is in high esteem.

1. Lit. & Entom.: Any species of the genus Vespa or of the family Vespidae (q.v.) particularly the Common Wasp (Vespa vulgaris). It lives in a hole in the ground, generally about six inches beneath the surface, approached by a crooked entrance of about an inch in diameter. This passage leads to a subterranean room, in which is the vespiary made of gray paper or pasteboard in layers one above the other, and constituting a ball of thirteen or fourteen inches in diameter, and pierced with two round holes, through which the wasps come in and go out. The interior is occupied by horizontal tiers of combs, like floors in a house, supported by columns, and with passages between. Each cell is hexagonal, as in the combs of bees, but the material is paper. These tiers of cells are built in succession, the upper ones first. Sexually, wasps are of three kinds, males, females, and neuters, the two latter armed with an exceedingly venomous sting. The last are the workers in the hive; they also go out to bring in provisions for the community. Wasps are nearly omnivorous, feeding on honey, jam, fruit, butcher's meat, and any insects which they can overpower. A swarm of these viands is given to the males and females, whose work lies more in the vespiary. The combs of a large nest may amount to fifteen or sixteen thousand. In these the females, which are few in number, deposit eggs, hatched in eight days into larvae. These again go into the chrysalis state in twelve or fourteen days more, and in ten more are perfect insects. The males do no work. Most of the workers and all the males die at the approach of winter, and in the spring each surviving female, having been impregnated in autumn, looks out for a suitable place to form a new vespiary. A wasp's nest may be destroyed by burning sulphur inside the hole. The economy of the other social wasps is essentially the same, whether, like Vespa holarctica (V. britannica), they build a nest of paper in trees, or, like the foreign Polistes, place their combs in trees or bushes without a papery defence. The economy of the solitary wasps is essentially that of their type, Odynera (q.v.), differing only in the material and locality of their nests, some building them of clay or agglutinated sand, and attaching them to or placing them in holes in walls, whilst a few burrow in sandy ground. The species popularly known as hornets and yellow-jackets have very severe stinging powers.

* 2. Fig.: A person characterized by ill-nature, petulance, peevishness, irritability, or petty malignity.

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. The state of being awake; forbearance of sleep; wakefulness, watchfulness.

"Fell into a sadness, then into a fast, Thence to a watch."—Shaksp.: Hamlet, II. 2.

2. The act or state of watching; a keeping awake for the purpose of attending, guarding, preserving, or the like; attendance without sleep; vigilance, vigil.

"Had your watch been good,

This sudden mischief never would have fallen."—Shaksp.: 1 Henry VI., II. 1.

* 3. Vigilance; close observation or attention.

"Follow her close, give her good watch, I pray you."—Shaksp.: Hamlet, IV. 5.

4. A person or number of persons set for a guard over the persons, property, or interests of others; a watchman or body of watchmen; a sentry, a sentinel, a guard.

"To him that cannot so much as see, to discharge the office of watch."—South: Sermons, vol. 1, ser. 5.

5. In the same sense as II. 1.

6. The period of time during which one person, or a body of persons, watch or attend sentinel, or the time from one relief of sentinels to another; hence, applied to a division of the night when the precautionary setting of a watch is more generally necessary. Amongst the Romans, the time from sunset to sunrise was divided into four equal spaces or watches, severally distinguished as first, second, third, and fourth watches, each containing three hours; but these hours varied in length, being longest in winter and shortest in summer, and the watch contained three of our hours only at the equinoxes. The Greeks also divided the night into four watches. The proper Jewish reckoning recognized only three of these watches, the first, from sunset till about 10 p.m., the second, or middle watch, from 10 p.m. to 2 a.m., and the third, or morning watch, from 2 a.m. to sunrise. After the establishment of the Roman power, the watches were increased in number to four, which were known as first, second, &c., or as even, midnight, cock-crowing, and morning, the watches terminating respectively at 9 p.m., midnight, 3 a.m., and 6 a.m. (Exodus xiv. 24, Judaea vii. 19, Matthew xiv. 25, Mark xiii. 35.)

7. Any contrivance by which the progress of time is perceived and measured; as,

* (1) A candle marked out into sections, each of which denoted a certain portion of time in burning.

"Give me a watch."—Shaksp.: Richard III., v. 3.

(2) A time-keeper actuated by a spring, and capable of being carried on the person. The essential difference between a clock and a watch has been defined to be that the latter will run in any position, but the former in a vertical position only. Since the invention of the cheap spring-clock this definition must be abandoned. Another characteristic which was formerly distinguishing was that the watch escapement was always controlled by a balance-wheel and spring, while the clock escapement was generally governed by a pendulum. Watches are said to have been invented at Nuremberg, about the end of the fifteenth or beginning of the sixteenth century. The essential portions of a watch are the dial, on which the hours, minutes, and seconds are marked, the hands, which by their movement round the dial point out the time, the train of wheels, which carry round the hands, &c., the balance, which regulates the motion of the wheels, and the mainspring, whose elastic force produces the motion of the whole machinery. The works are inclosed in a case of metal, usually silver or gold. The shape is now universally circular and flat, so as to be easily carried in the pocket. The early watches had but one hand, and required winding twice a day. The spring was at first merely a straight piece of steel, not coiled. A spring to regulate the balance was first applied by Dr. Hooke, 1658; this was at first made straight, but soon improved by making it of spiral form. A repeating-watch, or repeater, has a small bell, gong, or other sounding object, on which the hours, half-hours, quarters, &c., are struck on the compression of a spring. The most perfect form of watch is the chronometer (q.v.).

* 8. The place where a watch is set or kept. "I must to the watch."—Shaksp.: Othello, II. 5.

II. Technically:

1. Nautical:

(1) The period of time occupied by each part of a ship's crew alternately while on duty. This period is one of four hours, the reckoning beginning at noon or midnight. But in order to prevent the constant falling of the same watch to the same portion of the crew, the time between 4 p.m. and 8 p.m. is divided into two short watches of two hours each, technically known as dog-watches. Thus, the watch from 12 noon to 4 p.m. is the first afternoon watch; that from 4 p.m. to 6 p.m. the first dog-watch; and that from 6 p.m. to 8 p.m. the second dog-watch; from 8 p.m. to midnight is the first night watch; from midnight to 4 a.m. the middle watch; from 4 a.m. to 8 a.m. the morning watch; and from 8 a.m. to noon the forenoon watch. When this alternation of watches is kept up during the twenty-four hours, it is termed having watch and watch, in distinction from keeping all hands at work during one or more watches. An anchor-watch is a small watch composed of one or two men set to look after the ship while at anchor or in port.

(2) A certain portion of the officers and crew of a ship who together attend to working her for a certain period. [(1).] The crew of every ship while at sea is generally divided into two portions—the starboard-watch, which in the merchant service is the captain's watch, and is often commanded by the second mate; and the port-watch, which in the merchant service is commanded by the first mate. In the navy these watches are commanded by the lieutenants successively.

2. Pottery: A trial piece of fire-clay so placed in a pottery-kiln as to be readily withdrawn, to enable the workmen to judge of the heat of the fire and the condition of the ware.

¶ (1) The Black Watch: [BLACK WATCH.]

(2) Watch and ward: The ancient custom of watching by night and by day in towns and cities. A distinction was drawn between the terms watch and ward, the former being applied to watching and guarding by night, and the latter to watching and guarding by day; hence, the expression, watch and ward denotes a constant watching and guarding by day and night.

maker.] One whose occupation is to make and repair watches and clocks.

"Smithing comprehends all trades which use force or file, from the anchorsmith to the watchmaker."—Moxon.

watchmaker's glass, s. A double convex lens set in a tubular socket, adapted to be held to the eye by the contraction of the orbital muscles.

wäch-mäk-îng, s. [Eng. watch, s., and making.] The art or operation of making watches; the business or profession of a watchmaker.

wäch-man, * watche-man, s. [Eng.

watch, s., and man.]

1. A person set to keep watch; a guard, a sentinel.

"Watchman, what of the night?"—Isaiah xli. ii.

2. One who guards the streets of a city or town, or a large building by night. The old London watchmen, or Charleys, were very inefficient. They were replaced by the police in 1829. [CHANCELLOR, POLICE, s.]

3. One who watches over or guards anything.

"The special watchmen of our English weal."—Shaksp.: 1 Henry VI., iii. s.

* wäch-mënt, s. [Eng. watch, s.; -ment.]

A state of vigilance.

"My watchments are now over by my master's direction."—Richardson: Pamela, l. 207.

wäch-wörd, * watche-word, a. [Eng. watch, and word.]

1. The word given to sentinels, and to such as have occasion to visit the guards, used as a signal by which a friend may be known from an enemy, or a person who has a right to pass the watch from one who has not; a countersign, a password, a parole.

2. Hence, any preconceived indication or a direction eagerly watched for, as a signal for action.

"All have their ears upright, waiting when the watchword shall come, that they should arise into rebellion."—Spenser: State of Ireland.

3. A word used as a motto, as expressive of a principle or rule of action.

"Shouting the watchword of Progress and Enlightenment."—G. H. Lewis: Aristotle. (Prof. p. vii.)

wâ-tôr, s. [A.S. water; cogn. with Dnt. water; O. H. Ger. wasser, wassar; Ger. wasser.] From another root come the Scandinavian forms: as Icel. vata; Dan. vand; Sw. vatten; Goth. vato (pl. vadna). Cf. Russ. voda; Gr. βῆρα (hudōr); Lat. vada; Sansc. adan.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A clear, colourless, transparent liquid, destitute of taste and smell, and possessing a neutral reaction. It is one of the most important and most widely-distributed substances in nature, occurring universally in one or other of its three physical states—liquid, solid, or gaseous. As a liquid it constitutes the great mass of the oceans, rivers, and lakes, which cover nearly three-fourths of the earth's surface; in the solid state it exists permanently in the form of ice or snow in the polar regions; and as a vapour it is a constituent of the aerial envelope of the earth, and the exhalations of volcanoes and boiling springs. It occurs in combination in many mineral substances, and also in organic bodies, animals and plants containing from 80 to 90 per cent. Water is the most efficient of all solvents, there being few substances which are not, to some extent, affected by it, hence natural waters never occur absolutely pure, but contain in solution more or less of the constituents of the strata through which they have passed. Rain-water contains substances derived in minute quantities from the atmosphere, such as ammonia, nitrate of ammonia, carbonic acid, nitrous and sulphurous acids. Spring-water always contains a much larger proportion of dissolved substances than rain-water. When this is so highly charged with saline or gaseous constituents, as to have a peculiar taste or smell, and is unfit for ordinary use, it is called mineral-water (q.v.), and when the amount of these constituents do not sensibly affect its taste, &c., it is described as fresh-water. Sea-water is essentially a mineral water, its saline constituents consisting of the chlorides and sulphates of sodium, potassium, magnesium, and calcium, together with minute quantities of silica, bromine, iodine, phosphoric acid, &c. The total solid contents of sea-water in mid-ocean varies from 30 to 40 grms. per litre, being largest near the equator and smallest near the poles.

2. Water collected in a body, as the ocean, a sea, a lake, a river; any collection of water.

"The enervating waters rose Above what they have done."—Byron: Heaven & Earth, l. s.

3. Water from the heavens; rain.

"By sudden floods and fall of waters."—Shaksp.: Richard III., iv. s.

4. Applied to other fluids, liquid secretions, humours, &c., as:

(1) Tears.

"Then they seemed all to be glad, that the water stood in their eyes."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. II.

(2) Urine.

"Carry his water to the wise woman."—Shaksp.: Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

5. Applied to the colour or lustre of a diamond or pearl, and occasionally of other precious stones; as, a diamond of the first water—i.e., one perfectly pure and transparent.

"The diamonds of a most proved water."—Shaksp.: Pericles, iii. 2.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: H₂O. Water was long regarded as an element, but towards the end of the seventeenth century it was shown by Lavoisier to be a compound, and to consist of two parts by weight of hydrogen to sixteen of oxygen, or two volumes of hydrogen to one of oxygen. When pure it is free from taste and smell, and at ordinary pressure is liquid between 0° and fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wë, wët, here, camel, hër, thére; pine, pít, sire, sir, marine; gö, püt, or, wöre, wöf, wörk, whö, sön; müte, cüb, cüre, unite, cür, räle, füll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ö; ey = ä; qu = kw.

100°, boils at 100°, and freezes at 0°, expanding to the extent of one-seventh of its volume. The quantity of heat absorbed in the melting of ice is sufficient to raise the temperature of an equal weight of water 79.2°, and the quantity of heat rendered latent by water at 100°, becoming vapour, would raise the temperature of water 5.37 times as much as from 0° to 100°. Water is 825 times heavier than air, and when converted into steam expands to nearly 1,600 volumes. One cubic centimetre at 4°, and under a pressure of 760 mm. of mercury, weighs 15.432349 grains, or one gramme, the unit of weight in the metric system.

2. Comm.: Stock issued without any provision being made for the payment of interest thereon.

* But it is said by the chairman of the Committee on Public Finance, that "more than half of this stock is water, and could not have come into existence had not this business been superior to the control of competition."—St. James's Gazette, June 14, 1882.

3. Geol.: Water is one of the two most potent agencies in working geological changes on the earth's surface. In most cases it acts in direct antagonism to the other very potent cause, fire. Every river descending a mountain-slope, or crossing a plain, to reach the ocean carries with it, especially after heavy rain, abundant sediment, as does every tributary, great or small. Much of this sediment reaches the sea, where, if the water be deep, it is lost for a time, while, if the water be shallow, it may gradually build up a delta, which an earthquake shock may convert into land fully reclaimed from the ocean. The boulders, gravel, &c., too heavy to be transported so far, are arranged according to their weight, the heaviest falling first. The expansion of water when it freezes in the crevices of rocks enables it in many cases to rend them asunder, and leave them of more manageable size to be transported. [AQUOUS, B. 4.]

4. Law: Land is held to include water, but not water land. If the possession of a lake be disputed, the action must be brought, not for so many acres of water, but for so many acres of land covered with water.

¶ (1) Aerated water: Carbonated water. [CARBONATED.]

(2) Hard water: [HARD, 22.]

(3) Mineral waters: [MINERAL.]

(4) Soft water: [SOFT, A. 14.]

* (5) Strong waters: [STRONG-WATERS]

(6) To hold water: [HOLD, v., ¶ 13.]

(7) To keep above water, To keep one's head above water: To manage to struggle through or overcome financial difficulties.

"A number of struggling men, who have managed to keep above water during the bad seasons, must now go under."—Pield, Oct. 3, 1885.

(8) Water of crystallization: [CRYSTALLIZATION, ¶.]

(9) Water on the brain, Water in the head: Path.: A popular name for Hydrocephalus (q.v.).

¶ (10) Where the water sticks: The point in dispute.

"That the reader may see clearly where the water sticks between us."—Bramhall's Works, II. 266.

water-agrimony, s.

Bot.: Bidens tripartita. (Prior.) It grows in watery places.

water-alee, s.

Bot.: Stratiotes aloides.

water-analysis, s.

Chem.: The estimation of the dissolved contents of water under the three heads of gaseous, mineral, and organic matter, the latter including floating microcosms; but the term more generally refers, in the case of potable waters, to the determination of the organic matter and total mineral residue, without the separation of the latter into its constituent parts. No process of analysis does more than estimate the relative amount of organic matter; nor, excepting by the aid of the microscope, is any attempt made to differentiate between what is harmless and what is presumably hurtful. Wanklyn's method involves the estimation of the ammonia produced by boiling with permanganate of potash, and the amount of oxygen consumed as shown by the reduction of the permanganate. Frankland proceeds to determine the organic nitrogen and carbon, and from the results arrives at his conclusions respecting the purity of the water. Tidy allows the permanganate to react on the water at common temperature, and determines the loss of permanganate at the end of one hour and three hours respectively. Whichever method is adopted, there are certain minimum limits below which a water is considered good, and above which it is regarded as either of doubtful quality or likely to prove injurious. The statement of the various limits and attendant circumstances connected with the course of the water supply, and which go to qualify the results obtained, are to be found described at length by the authors referred to in their published methods of analysis.

Naut.: A drag-anchor (q.v.).

water-antelope, s.

Zoology:

1. (WATER-BUCK).

2. (PL.): A comprehensive name for the genus Electragus and its allies, from the fact that most of the species abound in marshy districts on the banks of the African rivers.

water-apple, s.

Bot.: The Custard-apple (q.v.).

water-avens, s. [AVENS.]

water-back, s. A permanent reservoir at the back of a stove or range, to utilize the heat of the fire in keeping a supply of hot water.

water-bailiff, s.

1. A custom-house officer in a port town for searching ships. (English.)

2. An officer employed to watch a fishing river to prevent poaching. (English.)

water-balance, s. An oscillating pendulous frame, having a series of troughs in vertical series and inclined in alternate directions, so that, as the frame oscillates, the water dipped by the lower one shall be poured into the next above, which, on the return motion, shall pour it into the next, and so on.

water-ballast, s. Water confined in compartments in the hold of a vessel to serve as ballast. [BALLAST, s., I. 1.]

water-barometer, s. A barometer in which water is employed instead of mercury for indicating the fluctuations in atmospheric density.

water-barrel, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: A water-cask.

2. Mining: A large wrought-iron barrel with a self-acting valve in the bottom, used in drawing water where there are no pumps.

water-barrow, s. A two-wheeled barrow, provided with a tank mounted on trunnions. Used by gardeners and others.

water-bath, s.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A bath of fresh or salt water, as distinguished from a vapour-bath.

2. A bain-marie.

II. Chem.: A copper vessel, having the upper cover perforated with circular openings from two to three inches in diameter. When in use it is nearly filled with water, which is kept boiling by means of a gas-burner, and the metallic or porcelain basin containing the liquid intended to be evaporated is placed over the openings mentioned above.

water-battery, s.

Elect.: A voltaic battery in which water is the liquid used to excite electric action.

* water-baylage, s. (See extract.)

"Water-baylage, a tax demanded upon all goods by the City, imported and exported."—Pepps's Diary, Jan. 20, 1669-9.

water-bean, s.

Bot. (Pl.): The order Nelumbiaceæ (q.v.). (Lindley.)

water-bearer, s.

Astron.: A quarius (q.v.).

water-bearing, s.

Mach.: A contrivance in which water or steam pressure is employed to counterbalance the downward pressure upon a rotating shaft, thereby obviating friction.

water-bears, s. pl.

Zool.: Sloth-animalcules (q.v.).

water-bed, s.

1. A bed composed of water, inclosed in a cushion case. On this bed all senesile pressure on any part of the body is removed, so that bed-sores are averted, and great relief from suffering afforded.

* 2. A bed on board ship.

"I was forced to return to my water-bed."—Sandys's Travels, p. 27.

water-beetles, s. pl.

Entom.: The Hydradephaga (q.v.).

water-bellows, s. A form of blowing-machine consisting of two or more inverted vessels suspended from the ends of a working-beam, and alternately rising and falling in the cisterns, which are nearly full of water. Induction and eduction pipes pass from below upward into the cisterns, their upper open ends being above the level of the water. The induction-pipes have valves on the top, and the eduction-pipes have valves at the bottom, so that the air cannot pass in the wrong direction.

water-betony, s.

Bot.: Scrophularia aquatica. (Prior.)

Water-betony moth:

Entom.: A British Night-moth, Cucullia scrophularia. Fore-wings pale ochre, with a dark-brown stripe, the hinder margin with two whitish crescents. Caterpillar greenish-white, feeding on Scrophularia nodosa and S. aquatica, &c.

water-bewitched, s. A term applied to any very weak liquid or greatly diluted drink.

"As for the broth, it was nothing but a little water-bewitched."—Bacon's Apoph. of Erasmus, p. 374.

water-birds, s. pl.

Ornith.: A general term for the Wading and Swimming Birds taken together.

water-blinka, s.

Bot.: Montia fontana.

water-boatmen, s. pl. [NOTONECTIDÆ.]

Water-borne, a. Borne by the water; floated; having water sufficient to float.

water-bosh, s. A metallic basin in a puddling or boiling furnace, which is made double, so that water may circulate there-through to protect the furnace from the destructive action of heat and cinder.

water-bottle, s. A glass toilet-bottle; a bottle for holding water at table.

water-brash, s. A form of indigestion; called also Water-qualm. [PYROSIIS.]

* water-break, s. A little wave; a ripple.

"Dauncing down thy water-breaks."—Wordsworth's Sonnets.

water-bridge, s.

Steam: A low vertical partition at the back of a furnace to deflect the flue upward.

water-buck, water-antelope, s.

Zool.: Kobus ellipsiprymnus, a large antelope from South Africa. Ground colour dark rusty iron-grey or grayish-brown, with an elliptical white patch near the root of the tail. It stands about four feet and a half high at the shoulders.

water-buckler, s.

Bot.: The genus Hydropeitis (q.v.).

water-budget, water-bouget, s.

Her.: A heraldic device intended to represent a vessel, or rather two vessels, connected by a yoke, anciently used by soldiers for carrying water in long marches and across deserts; and also by water-carriers to convey water from the conduits to the houses of the citizens. It is a bearing frequent in English coat-armour. [BOUGET.]

WATER-BUDGET.

water-bugs, s. pl.

Entom.: A popular name for the Hydrocoera (q.v.).

water-but, s. A large open-headed cask, usually set upon end in an outhouse or close to a dwelling, and serving as a reservoir for rain or pump-water.

water-caltrops or caltropes, s.

Bot.: The genus Trape (q.v.).

boil, boy; péit, jówl; cat, çell, chorus, çhia, bench; ge, gem; thin, çhis; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exist. -iñg -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -çion, -çion = zhün. -ctous, -tious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bpl, dpl.

water-can, s.

Botany:

(1) Nuphar lutea. So named from the shape of the seed-vessels. (Prior.)(2) Nymphaea alba. (Britten & Holland.)water-canker, s.

Pathol.: Ulcerative stomatitis. [NOMA.]

water-carpet, s.Entom.: A British geometer moth, Otidaria suffumata, of which two varieties exist. The fore wings in both are very gloasy, the former with two the latter with one shade of brown.water-carriage, s.1. Transportation or conveyance by water.
* 2. Means of conveyance by water; a vessel or boat.water-carrier, s.1. One who conveys water from the conduits, wells, &c., to the houses of the citizens.
2. A form of water-elevator in which the bucket lifted from the well or cistern is transported on wires to the house at a considerable distance.

3. A grip or furrow for conveying water over land.

*Origs and water-carriers pervade the whole area of this river-basin.—Field, Feb. 12, 1886.

water-cart, s. A cart carrying water for sale, or for watering streets, gardens, &c. In the latter case it contains a large tank, at the end of which runs a pipe perforated with small holes, through which the water is sprinkled on the streets, &c.water-cask, s. A large strong, hooped barrel, used in ships for holding water for use on board. water-caster, s. A urinalist (q.v.).

* A face with rubies mixed like alabaster, Wastes much in physics and her water-caster.—Taylor (The Water-poet).

water-cement, s. A cement which possesses the property of hardening under water, and is therefore employed in structures which are built under water, and also for lining cisterns, coating damp walls on basement stories, &c.water-chains, s. pl.Ornith.: Swainson's name for the Fluvicola (q.v.).water-chestnut, s.Bot.: Tropa natans. The English name is translated from the French Marron d'eau.water-chickweed, s.Bot.: Montia fontana.water-chrysolite, s. [BOTTLE-STONE.]water-cicadas, s. pl.

Entom.: The same as WATER-BOATMEN. (Swainson.)

water-clock, s. An instrument to indicate the time by the passage of water into or from a vessel. [CLEPSYDRA.]water-closet, s. A commode with water supply to flush the basin, carry off the contents, and prevent the rise of sewer-gas.water-color, s. & a.

A. As substantive:

1. A color carefully ground up with water and isinglass, or other mucilage, instead of oil. Water-colors are often prepared in the form of small cakes dried hard, which can be rubbed on a moistened palette when wanted. Moist water-colors in a semi-fluid state are also used. They are generally kept in metal tubes, which preserve them from becoming dry and hard.

*Such water-colours, to impart his cause.—Shakesp.: 1 Henry IV., v. 1.

2. A water-color painting.

*The water-colours exhibited by Mr. Oifford are remarkable for nicety of observation.—Scribner's Magazine, Sept., 1878, p. 213.

B. As adj.: Painted or executed in water-colors.

Water-color painting:

1. The art of painting in water-colors.
2. A painting executed in water-colors.water-colorist, water-colourist, s. One who paints in water colors.

*Instead of hazarding again his reputation as a water-colorist after the success of last year.—Scribner's Magazine, Sept., 1878, p. 313.

water-column, s. A column or pillar of water.

*Rising like water-columns from the sea.—Byron: Childs Harold, iv. 18.

water-course, s. [WATERCOURSE.]water-craft, s. Vessels or boats plying on water.† water-orake, s.

Ornith.: The Water-ousel (q.v.). (Willughby: Ornithology (ed. Ray), p. 149.)

water-crane, s. A goose-neck apparatus for supplying water from an elevated tank to the tender of a locomotive-engine.† water-crow, s.

Ornithology:

1. [See extract under OUSEL, s., ¶ (2)].
2. [WATER-TURKEY.]water-crowfoot, s.Bot.: Ranunculus aquatilis. The stem is submerged, the leaves beneath the water being capillaceous multifid, those which float trifid or tripartite, with cut or cretated lobes, the petals white. Common in lakes, ponds, and ditches, flowering from May to August.water-cup, s.Bot.: The genus Hydrocotyle (q.v.).water-cure, s. The same as HYDRO-PATHY (q.v.).water-deok, s.

Mil.: A painted piece of canvas used for covering the saddle and bridle, girths, &c. of a dragoon's horse. (Anandale.)

water-deer, s.Zool.: Hydropotes inermis, a small deer from China. It is about the size of the Muntjac (q.v.), which it resembles in having the upper canines developed into tusks, but there is no tuft on the head. Colour light red-brown.water-deerlet, s.Zool.: Tragulus aquaticus, from Sierra Leone and the Gambia district. Coat deep glossy brown, with longitudinal white stripes, and irregularly spotted with white.water-dely, s.

Anthrop.: A dely supposed to preside over some river, sea, or lake. (See extract under WATER-WORSHIPPER.)

water-demon, s.

Anthrop.: A demon supposed to inhabit the water. (See extract under WATER-KELPIE.)

water-devil, s.Entom.: Hydrous or Hydrophilus piceus. So named apparently from its large size, its pitchy colour, and its predatory tendencies.water-dock, s.Bot.: Rumex Hydrolopathum, a large, erect branched dock, three to six feet high, growing in Britain in ditches and by river-sides. water-doctor, s.

1. A urinalist (q.v.).

2. A hydropathist.

water-dog, s.

1. A dog accustomed to the water, and having considerable swimming powers; specifically, a water-spaniel (q.v.).

2. A name given in some parts of the United States to various species of salamanders.

3. A name for small, irregular, floating clouds in a rainy season, supposed to indicate rain. (Prov. & Scotch.)

4. A sailor, especially, an old sailor; an old salt. (Colloq.) [SEA-DOG, 3.]

water-drain, s. A drain or channel for carrying off water.water-drainage, s. The draining off of water.water-dressing, s.

Surg.: The treatment of wounds and ulcers by the application of water, or of dressings saturated with water only.

water-drop, s. A drop of water; hence, a tear. (Shakesp.: Lear, ii. 4.)water-dropwort, s. [CENANTHE.]water-elder, s.Bot.: Viburnum Opulus. (Prior.) [GUELDER-ROSE.]water-elephant, s. A name sometimes given to the hippopotamus.water-elevator, s.

1. A contrivance for raising buckets in wells. The forms are various.

2. An elevator for warehouses and other buildings, operated by water acting through the medium of gravity or by hydraulic pressure.

water-engine, s.

1. An engine driven by water, as a water-wheel. The term is somewhat more definitely applied to an engine in which water under pressure of a head acts upon a piston.

2. An engine to raise water.

water-ermine, s.Entom.: A British Tiger moth, Arctia urticae. Wings white, the fore pair each with a black dot; head and thorax yellow, body yellow, the tip snowy white, with a row of black spots down the back and one on each side. Caterpillar black, very hairy. It feeds in marshy places on mint, willow-herb, &c., concealing itself on the under side of the leaves. The moth appears in June.water-featherfoil, s.Bot.: Hottonia palustris. (Prior.)water-fennel, s.

Botany:

1. Enanthe Phellandrium. (Prior.)2. Callitriche verna. (Britten & Holland.) [WATER-STARWORT.]water-fern, s.Bot.: (1) Osmunda regalis; (2) Ceratopteris thalictroides. Its fronds are boiled and eaten in the Indian Archipelago.water-fight, s. A naval engagement.

*Such a various and floating water-fight.—Milton: Hist. England, bk. ii.

water-fire, s.Bot.: Bergia ammannioides, a species of water-pepper found on the borders of Indian tanks. The trivial name is translated from the Tamil Neer-mel-neripoo.water-flag, s.Bot.: Iris Pseudacorus.water-flannel, s.

Botany:

1. Conferva crispata, one of the Confervas forming beds of entangled filaments on the surface of water. [CROW-SILK.]

2. Water-net (q.v.).

water-flea, s.

Zool.: A popular name for any of the Branchiopoda (q.v.).

water-float, s. A device in a cistern, boiler, &c., which, floating on the water, actuates a valve.water-flood, s. A flood of water; an inundation.water-flower, s.Bot.: Geum rivale. (Britten & Holland.) water-flowing, a. Flowing like water; streaming.

*My mercy dried their water-flowing tears.—Shakesp.: 2 Henry VI., iv. 2.

water-fly, s.

1. Ordinary Language & Entomology:

(1) The genus Perla (q.v.). Applied loosely to any winged insect frequenting the surface of water.(2) The genus Gyrinus (q.v.).

* 2. Fig.: Used as an emblem of emptiness and vanity.

*Dost know this water-fly!—Shakesp.: Hamlet, v. 2.

water-fowl, s.

1. A bird that frequents the water, or lives about rivers, lakes, or in or near the sea; an aquatic fowl. The term is generally applied to web-footed birds, but is also used of herons, plovers, and other birds that frequent rivers, lakes, and the sea-shore.

2. Such birds collectively; wild fowl.

 water-fox, s. A name given to the carp, on account of its supposed cunning.

*As the carp is accounted the water-fox for his cunning, so the roach is accounted the water-sheep.—Walton: Angler.

fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wē, wēt, hère, camēl, hēr, thère; pine, pit, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

water-frame, s. A name given to the spinning-jenny, from the fact that at first it was driven by water.

water-furrow, v.t. To drain by drawing furrows across the ridges in the lowest part of the ground.

*Water-furrow thy ground,
That rains, when it cometh, may run away round.*
Paster: Husbandrie, p. 88.

water-furrow, s.

Agric. : A channel, furrow, or grip for conducting water from the land; a watercourse.

water-gage, s. [WATER-GAUGE] water-gall, s.

1. A cavity made in the earth by a torrent of water.

2. An appearance in the sky known from experience to presage the approach of rain; a rainbow-coloured spot; an imperfectly formed, or a secondary rainbow; a weather-gall.

*"These water-galls . . . foretell new storms."

water-gang, s. A trench or course for conveying a stream of water.

water-gas, s. Gas obtained by the decomposition of water. Water in the form of steam is passed over red-hot coke, resolving it into hydrogen and carbonic oxide, the oxygen being absorbed. The hydrogen and carbonic oxide are then passed through a retort, in which carbonaceous matter, such as resin, is undergoing decomposition, absorbing therefrom sufficient carbon to render it luminous when burnt.

water-gate, s. A water plug or valve.

water-gauge, s.

1. Ord. Lang. : A wall or bank to restrain or hold back water.

2. Steam-engine : An instrument or attachment to a steam-boiler to indicate the depth of water therein.

water-gavel, s.

Law : A rent paid for fishing or any other benefit derived from some river.

water-germander, s.

Bot. : Teucrium Scordium.

water-gilder, s. One who practises the art of water-gilding (q.v.).

water-gilding, s. A mode of gilding by an amalgam to which the articles are pickled and then dipped in or brushed with a dilute solution of nitrate of mercury and gold, called quick-water, which leaves a film of amalgam on the surface. After dipping the articles are exposed to heat in a cage within a furnace, and the mercury is thus driven off. The gold surface is then polished with a blood-stone burnisher.

water-gladiolus, s.

Bot. : The genus Eutomus. (Gerarde.)

water-glass, s.

1. A water clock or clepsidra.

2. Soluble glass (q.v.).

water-god, s.

Anthrop. : (See extract.)

"Divine springs, streams, and lakes, water-spirits, deities concerned with the clouds and rain, are frequent, and many details of them are cited here, but I have not succeeded in finding among the lower races any divinity whose attributes, fairly criticised, will show him or her to be an original and absolute elemental Water-god."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1878), li. 274.

water-gruel, s. A liquid food composed of water and a small portion of meal or other farinaceous substance boiled and seasoned with salt.

"I could eat water-gruel with thee a mouth for this jest."—Ben Jonson: Cynthia's Revels, li. l.

water-gut, s.

Bot. : The genus Euteromorpha (q.v.).

water-hammer, s. (See extract.)

"In a vacuum, however, liquids fall like solids without separation of their molecules. The water-hammer illustrates this: the instrument consists of a thick glass tube about a foot long, half filled with water, the air having been expelled by ebullition previous to closing one extremity with the blow-pipe. When such a tube is suddenly inverted, the water falls in one undivided mass against the other extremity of the tube, and produces a sharp, dry sound, resembling that which accompanies the shock of two solid bodies."—Atkinson: Ganot's Physics, § 77.

water-hemlock, s.

Bot. : The genus Cleuta (q.v.).

water-hemp, s.

Bot. : Evidens tripartita.

Water-hemp agrimony :

Bot. : (1) [WATER-HEMP.] (2) The Hemp-agrimony (q.v.).

water-hen, s.

Ornith. : Gallinulus chloropus, generally distributed throughout Europe, Africa, and found in parts of Asia. Length of male about thirteen inches; back, wings, rump, and tail rich dark olive-brown; head, neck, breast, and sides dark slate-gray; thighs and flanks streaked with white; belly and vent grayish white; under tail-coverts white; beak yellowish, becoming red, as Pennant notes, in the breeding season; naked patch on forehead red; red garter above tarsal joint; legs and toes greenish-yellow, claws dark-brown. The female rather larger and more vividly coloured than the male. They frequent ponds covered with aquatic herbage, overgrown watercourses, and the banks of slow rivers, swimming and diving with facility, assisted by an expansion of the membrane along the sides of the toes.

water-hog, s.

Zoology :

1. A popular name for any species of Potamochoerus (q.v.).

"The species of Potamochoerus frequent swampy grounds, and sometimes receive the name of water-hog."—Chambers's Encyc. (ed. 1888), x. 73.

2. The genus Hydrochoerus (q.v.).

water-hole, s.

Mining : A sump (q.v.).

water-horhound, s.

Bot. : Lycopus europaeus.

water-horsetail, s.

Bot. : The genus Chara (q.v.).

water-hyssop, s.

Bot. : Gratiola officinalis.

water-inch, s.

Hydraul. : A measure of water equal to the quantity discharged in the twenty-four hours through a circular opening of one inch diameter leading from a reservoir under the least pressure, that is when the water is only so high as to cover the orifice. This quantity is 500 cubic feet very nearly.

water-indicator, s. A water-gauge (q.v.).

water-injector, s. A form of pump used on steam boilers.

water-kelpie, s.

Anthrop. : A water-spirit (q.v.).

"That confusion between the spiritual water-demon and the material water-monster, which runs on into the midst of European mythology in such conceptions as that of the water-kelpie and the sea-serpent."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), li. 210.

* water-lade, s. A gutter, a drain.

"The water-lades [were] stopped up."—P. Holland: Camden, p. 741.

water-laid, a. Coiled "agalust the sun," that is, over to the left: as, a water-laid rope.

water-leaf, s.

Bot. : (1) The genus Hydrophyllum; (2) Rhodymenia palmata.

water-leg, s. A vertical water-tube in a steam-boiler, connecting other water-spaces, and crossing a flue-space by which its contents are heated.

water-lemon, s.

Bot. : Passiflora laurifolia.

water-lentil, water-lens, s.

Bot. : The genus Lemna (q.v.).

water-lettuce, s.

Bot. : Pistia stratiotes. (West Indian.)

water-level, s.

1. The level formed by the surface of still water.

2. A levelling instrument in which water is employed instead of spirit. It consists of a metal tube, bent at both ends, in which are fitted glass tubes. It is placed on a tripod, and water poured in until it rises in both legs. When the liquid is at rest, the level of the water in both tubes is the same; that is, they are both in the same horizontal plane.

water-lily, s.

Bot. : The popular name for various plants of the order Nymphaeales, the resemblance of which to the Liliium, or true lily genus, is not close, they being exogenous and it endogenous. The White Water-lily is Nymphaea alba, the Yellow Water-lily, Naphar lutea.

"Where among the water-lilies Fishkech, the brant, were sailing."
Longfellow: Hiawatha, xvii.

water-lime, s. Hydraulic lime.

water-line, s.

1. Shipbuild. : One of the ship's lines drawn parallel with the surface of the water, at varying heights. In the sheer plan they are straight and horizontal; in the half-breadth plan they show the form of the ship at the successive heights marked by the water-lines in the sheer plan. [KEY-MODEL.]

2. Naut. : The line up to which the hull of a vessel is submerged in the water.

water-lizards, s. pl.

Zool. : The Montionidae or Varsnidae (q.v.).

water-locust, s.

Bot. : Gleditschia monosperma, the Swamp Locust-tree (q.v.).

water-lotus, s.

Bot. : Nelumbium speciosum.

water-lute, s. An air-trap (q.v.).

water-mark, s.

I. Ordinary Language :

1. The mark or limit of the rise of a flood; the mark indicating the rise and fall of the tide.

2. The same as WATER-LINE (q.v.).

II. Paper-making : Any distinguishing device or devices indelibly stamped in the substance of a sheet of paper while yet in a damp or pulpy condition. The device representing the water-mark is stamped in the fine wire gauze of the mould itself. The design is engraved on a block, from which an electrotype impression is taken; a matrix, or mould, is similarly formed from this. These are subsequently mounted upon blocks of lead or gutta-percha, to enable them to withstand the necessary pressure, and serve as a cameo and intaglio die, between which the sheet of wire gauze is placed to receive an impression in a stamping-press. The water-marks used by the earlier paper-makers have given names to several of the present standard sizes of paper, as pot, foolscap, crown, elephant, fan, post, the last dating from the year 1670 (when a general post-office was established in England), and formerly bearing the device of a post-man's horn; the first was in use at least as early as 1530.

"The water-mark on Mr. Denison's manuscript consists of an open hand."—Athenaeum, May 3, 1854, p. 563.

water-meadow, s. A meadow capable of being kept in a state of fertility by being flooded with water at certain seasons from an adjoining stream. Generally applied to meadows intersected by channels, which, by means of dams, can at any time be made to overflow the land.

* water-measure, s. A measure formerly in use for articles brought by water, as coals, oysters, &c. The bushel used for this purpose was larger than the Winchester bushel by about three gallons.

water-measurer, s.

Entom. (Pl.) : A book-name for the Hydrometridae (q.v.).

water-melon, s.

Bot. : Citrullus vulgaris (= Cucumis Citrullus). The leaves are deeply lobed and gashed; the fruit large, round, with a spotted rind; cold, watery, pink or white flesh, and black seeds. It is cultivated largely in the United States, India, China, Japan, and other parts of Asia, Egypt, &c., for its juicy fruit, which is cool and refreshing. It is the melon of Scripture. [MELON, 2.]

water-meter, s.

1. A contrivance for measuring the amount of water received or discharged through an orifice. There are numerous varieties.

2. An instrument for determining the amount of water evaporated in a given time, as from a steam-boiler.

water-mice, s. pl.

Zool. : The genus Hydromya (q.v.), sometimes elevated to a sub-family (Hydromyinae).

hōll, bōy; pōut, jōw1; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, henç; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f
-cian, -tian = şaη. -tion, -sion = şhūn; -çion, -çion = şhūn. -cions, -tious, -sious = şhūs. -hle, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

The species are small rat-like animals of slender form, with long tails and short limbs; toes partially webbed.

water-milfoil, s.

Bot.: Myriophyllum verticillatum.

water-mill, s. A mill whose machinery is moved by the agency of water.

water-mint, s.

Bot.: Mentha aquatica, a mint having the leaves ovate, serrate, stalked, the flowers dense in terminal obtuse heads or spikes, or sometimes in remote axillary whorls. It is frequent by the side of rivers and marshes in Britain.

water-mites, s. pl. [HYDRACHTIDA.]

water-moccasin-snake, s. [WATER-VIPER.]

water-mole, s. [DUCKBILL.]

water-monster, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: Any huge marine animal. (See extract under WATER-KELP.)

2. Anthrop.: A water-spirit (q.v.).

"Among the Sioux Indians it is 'Ung-tah,' the water-monster, that drowns his victims in flood or rapid."—Taylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), L. 110.

water-moss, s.

Bot.: Fontinalis antipyretica

water-motor, s. An application of the water-wheel to domestic purposes, such as running sewing-machines, organs, &c., by water from the customary mains.

water-murrain, s. A kind of murrain affecting cattle.

water-net, s.

Bot.: Hydractylon utriculatum, a coniferoid algal, constituting a tubular net with pentagonal or hexagonal meshes and viviparous articulations. It floats on water. Rare in England, but occurs on the pond in the old Botanical Gardens at Cambridge.

water-newt, s. [TRITON, 2.]

water-nixie, s. A water-spirit; an elf inhabiting the water. (Proc.)

"The shallowness of a water-nixie's soul may have a charm until she becomes diabolic."—George Eliot: Madam Trench, ch. xiv.

water-nut, s. A Siaghara-nut (q.v.).

water-nymph, s.

1. Bot.: The genus Nymphaea.

2. Mythol.: A naiad (q.v.).

water-opessum, s. [YAPOCK.]

* water-ordeal, s. An ancient form of trial by means of water. [ORDEAL, WITCH.]

water-ousel, s. [OUSEL, s., ¶ (2).]

water-oven, s.

Chem.: An apparatus employed for drying substances, at or near the temperature of boiling water, without the vessel containing them coming in contact with the vapour of water, as in the case of the open water-bath. It consists usually of an oblong copper vessel, surrounded with a jacket of the same metal, the intervening space being nearly filled with water, which is kept continuously at the boiling-point by means of a gas-burner placed under the apparatus. The steam generated in the interior is condensed by passing through a lengthened vertical pipe, by means of which the water again returns to the vessel. If it is desired to attain a heat rather over 100°, a little salt is dissolved in the water contained in the apparatus.

water-packer, s.

Well-boring: A cap on the top of a pipe to exclude surface-water.

water-padda, s.

Zool.: Breviceps gibbosus, a toad from the Cape of Good Hope. Upper surface with small warts, belly granulate. Brown above, with a broad, brownish-yellow, serrated dorsal band; an obsolete lateral streak of the same colour.

water-parsnip, s.

Bot.: Sium latifolium.

* water-parting, s. A watershed (q.v.).

water-pepper, s.

Botany:

1. Polygonum Hydropiper.

2. Elatine Hydropiper.

3. (Pl.): The Elatinaceae. (Linkley.)

water-pig, s.

Zool.: The genus Hydrochaeris (q.v.).

water-pillar, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: A waterspout (q.v.).

2. Mach.: A water-craue (q.v.).

water-pimpernel, s.

Bot.: Veronica Beccabunga. [BROOKLIME.]

water-pipe, s. A pipe for the conveyance of water. [PIPE, s.]

water-pipit, s.

Ornith.: Anthus epipoleta (misprinted spinolleta in Linna. Syst. Nat., ed. 12th, i. 288), a native of the centre and south of Europe, north Africa, ranging into Asia as far as China. It is about seven inches long; plumage grayish-brown above, slightly mottled with darker streaks along the middle of each feather; warm vinaceous buff on throat and breast, becoming lighter on belly.

water-pitcher, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: A pitcher for holding water.

2. Bot. (Pl.): A popular name for the Sarceniaceae (q.v.). Named from the pitchers constituted by the hollow urn-shaped petioles. Classed with the Insectivorous plants.

water-plant, s.

Bot.: A plant growing in the water, as distinguished from a terrestrial and an aerial plant.

water-plantain, s.

Bot.: Alisma Plantago.

water-plate, s. A plate with a double bottom filled with hot water to keep food warm.

"This kind of dish above all, requires to be served up hot, or sent off in water-plates, that your friend may have it almost as warm as yourself."—C. Lamb: Essays of Elia; Dissect Correspondence.

water-platter, s.

Bot.: Victoria regia.

water-poise, s. A hydrometer, or instrument for ascertaining the specific gravity of different liquids.

water-pot, s.

1. A vessel for holding or conveying water.

"There were set six water-pots of stone."—John II. 6.

2. A watering-pot.

* 3. A chamber-pot.

water-power, s. The power of water employed, or capable of being employed, as a prime mover in machinery.

water-pox, s.

Pathol.: Varicella (q.v.).

water-press, s. A hydrostatic-press (q.v.).

water-privilege, s.

1. The right to use running water to turn machinery.

2. A stream or body of water capable of being utilized in driving machinery.

water-propeller, s. A rotary-pump (q.v.).

water-pump, s. An air-pump in which a falling or driven body of water is made the means of inducing an exhaust current of air, or air and steam, from a room, a vacuum-jan, a condenser, &c.

water-purple, s. Veronica Beccabunga, found in moist places. [BROOKLIME.] According to Jamieson, the latter element in the compound has reference to the colour of the flowers. (Scotch.) water-purslane, s.

Bot.: The genus Pepils (q.v.).

* water-quake, s. A disturbance of water produced by volcanic action.

"Wittlesmere . . . doth sometimes . . . rise tempestuously, as it were, into violent water-quakes."—P. Holland: Camden, p. 500.

water-qualm, s. The same as WATER-BRASH (q.v.).

* water-quintain, s. A tilt on the lee. (Strutt.)

water-rabbit, s.

Zool.: Lepus aquaticus, an American species, most abundant in the swampy tracts bordering on the Mississippi and its tributaries in the south-western States, whence it is also called the Swamp Hare. It is an excellent swimmer, and subsists chiefly on the roots of aquatic plants. Fur dark grayish-brown above, white below, coarse in texture; ears and tail long.

water-radish, s.

Bot.: Nasturtium amphibium, a British plant, two to four feet high, with pinnatifid leaves and yellow flowers, growing in wet places, and flowering from June to September.

water-rail, s.

Ornith.: Rallus aquaticus, generally distributed over Europe, and fairly common in Britain, though not often seen, from its shy, retired habits. The male is about eleven inches in length, female somewhat smaller; general plumage brown, streaked with black; lores and eyebrows, sides of face, and underparts slaty-gray. It frequents marshes and bogs, and swims and dives well, but is bad on the wing. It is a delicious bird for the table.

water-ram, s. A machine for raising water; a hydraulic ram.

water-rat, s.

Lit. & Zool.: A common but misleading popular name for Arvicola amphibius, the Water-vole (q.v.).

water-rate, s. A rate or charge for the supply of water.

water-rattle, s.

Zool.: Crotalus adamanteus, the Diamond Rattlesnake. It often reaches eight feet in length; yellowish-brown with dark brown spots, belly yellowish, tail black or barred with black. Found in damp and shady places in North Carolina and Texas, and varieties of it range into California and Mexico. It is exceedingly poisonous.

water-reed, s.

Bot.: The genus Arundo (q.v.).

water-retting, s. [RETTING.]

water-rice, s.

Bot.: Zizania aquatica.

water-rites, s. pl.

Anthrop.: Rites connected with water-worship (q.v.).

"Elsewhere in Europe, the list of still-existing water-rites may be extended."—Taylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), II. 214.

water-recket, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: A kind of firework to be discharged in the water.

2. Bot.: Sisymbrium sylvestris.

water-room, s.

Steam-eng.: The space in a steam-boiler occupied by water, as distinct from that which contains steam.

water-rose, s.

Bot.: Nymphaea alba; (2) Nuphar lutea.

water-ret, v. t. To rot or ret by steeping in water.

* water-rug, s. A species of dog.

"Shougha, water-rugs and demwolves are clept All by the name of dogs."—Shakesp.: Macbeth, III. I.

water-sail, s.

Naut.: A sail set in very light airs and smooth water, below the lower studding-sail booms and next to the water.

water-salamander, s.

Zool.: A newt (q.v.).

water-sallow, s. [WATER-WILLOW.]

water-sapphire, s.

Min.: A jeweller's name for the transparent variety of iolite (q.v.), to distinguish it from the Oriental Sapphire (Cordunium).

water-scorpions, s. pl. [NEPIDÆ, NEPÆ.]

water-screw, s. An Archimedean screw (q.v.).

water-sheep, s. [See extract under WATER-FOX.]

water-shell, s.

Ornith.: A common shell or cast-iron cylinder filled with water, into which is fitted a small cylinder containing a quarter, or, at the most, fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sire, sîr, marine; gô, pôť, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unîte, cûr, rûle, fûll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ê; ey = â; qu = kw.

half an ounce of gun-cotton; it is then hermetically sealed; a few grains of fulminate of mercury are placed between the gun-cotton and the fuse, and, as soon as the latter is fitted, the shell is ready for firing.

water-shield, s.

Botany:

1. The genus Hydropeltis.

2. (Pl.): The order Cabombaceae (q.v.).

water-shoot, s.

1. A sprig or shoot from the root or stock of a tree. (Prov.)

2. A wooden trough for discharging water from a building. (Gwilt.)

water-shrew, s.

Zool.: Crossopus fodiens, common over the continent of Europe as far north as the Baltic, found in many parts of Britain, but not known to occur in Ireland. About three inches long, tail two inches; generally black above and white beneath; but there is great variation in the colour of different specimens, some of which have been described as distinct species. [OAREP-SHREW.]

*water-shut, s. A well-cover.

"A large well-squared stone, which he would not to serve his style, or for some water-shut."
Browne: Britannia's Pastoralis.

water-side, s. [WATERSIDE.]

water-sky, s. [For def. see extract.]

"Navigators can judge of the extent of ice beyond the horizon by a peculiar glistening of the atmosphere known as the ice-hink; over open water the sky looks dark and is known as water-sky."—Ripley & Dana: Amer. Cyclop., xii, 664.

water-xlii, s.

Zool.: The genus Asellus.

water-snail, s.

1. Hydr.: A spiral pump (q.v.).

2. Zool. (Pl.): A general name for snails inhabiting water, as the Limnæids. It is opposed to the term Land Snails, as the Helicidae.

water-snake, s.

Zoology:

1. Tropidonotus natrix. [SNAKE.]

2. Any individual of the Hydrophidæ (q.v.).

*water-soak, v.t. To soak or fill the interstices of with water.

water-sooks, s.

Bot.: Nymphaea alba. (Britten & Holland.)

*water-sodden, a. Soaked and softened in water.

water-soldier, s.

Botany:

1. The genus Stratiotes (q.v.); spec., S. aloides.

2. Pistia stratiotes. (Loudon.)

water-spaniel, s. [SPANIEL, A. I. (2).]

water-speedwell, s.

Bot.: Veronica maritima.

water-spider, s.

1. Entom.: The genus Hydrometra (q.v.).

2. Zool.: The Diving-spider (q.v.). Applied also to any of the Natantes (q.v.).

water-spike, s.

Bot.: The genus Potamogeton (q.v.).

water-spirit, s.

Anthrop.: A spirit supposed to reside in lakes, rivers, and the sea. Water-spirits were believed to be the active agents in all cases of drowning and shipwreck, and to avenge the rescue of drowning persons on their rescuers. Hence arose the widespread superstition that it was unlucky to save a shipwrecked person or one who had fallen into the water. (Cf. Scott: Pirate, ch. vii.) The belief in water-spirits was almost universal at an early stage of culture, and still lingers in a poetic form on the banks of the Rhine. (Cf. Heine's Lorelei.) [WATER-WORSHIP. See also extract under WATERMAN, II.]

"From this point of view, it is obvious that, to save a sinking man is to snatch a victim from the very clutches of the water-spirit, a rash defiance of deity which would hardly pass unavenged."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), I, 110.

water-sprite, s. A spirit or spirit inhabiting the water.

"As if it dodged a water-sprite."
Cotteridge: Ancient Mariner.

*water-standing, a. Perpetually filled with tears; wet.

"Many an orphan's water-standing eye."
Shakspeare: 2 Henry VI., v. 4.

water-starwort, s.

Bot.: The common name of British plants of the genus Callitriche. [STARWORT.]

*water-steed, s. An old name for the bed of a river. (Smyth.)

water-supply, s. The amount of water supplied to a community for drinking, culinary, detergent, and other purposes: as, this water-supply of a town.

water-tabby, s.

Fabric: A waved silk stuff. [TANBY.]

water-table, s.

Arch.: A coping or projecting-stone to shed the wet. Water-tables occur on the various stages of buttresses, tops of battlements, &c.

water-tank, s. A fixed cistern on shores or a metal receiver on board ship for holding water. (Simmonds.)

water-tap, s. A tap or cock by which water may be drawn from any supply.

water-tath, s. [Tath, a provincial term for cow's or sheep's dung dropped in a pasture; hence, the luxuriant grass growing about such dung; Icel. tath = dung; tatha = hay of a dunged field.] Coarse, rank grass growing in wet ground, and supposed to be injurious to sheep. (Prov.)

water-thermometer, s. An instrument in which water is substituted for mercury, for ascertaining the precise degree of temperature at which water attains its maximum density. This is at 39° 2' Fahr., or 4° Cent., and from that point downwards to 32° Fahr., or 0° Cent., or the freezing-point, it expands, and it also expands from the same point upwards to 212° Fahr., or 100° Cent., or the boiling-point.

*water-thief, s. A pirate. (Shakspeare: Merchant of Venice, I, 3.)

water-thyme, s.

Bot.: The genus Anacharis (q.v.), and especially Anacharis alinastrum.

water-tick, s.

Zool.: The same as WATER-SPIDER, I. (q.v.).

water-tight, a. [WATERTIGHT.]

†water-tofana, s. [AQUA-TOFANA.]

water-torch, s.

Bot.: Typha latifolia.

water-tree, s.

Bot.: Tetracera alnifolia, a tree about sixteen feet high, with yellow flowers, growing in Guinea. The Red Water-tree is Erythrophloeum guiniense.

water-trefoil, s.

Bot.: Menyanthes trifoliata. [MENYANTHES.]

water-trunk, s. A square rain-water pipe.

water-tupelo, s.

Bot.: Nyssa denticulata. It is a large tree, growing in the Southern States of America, and yielding a fruit sometimes made into a preserve.

water-turkey, s.

Ornith.: Plotus ankinga.

"This bird is a constant resident in Florida, and the lower parts of Louisiana, Alabama, and Georgia; in spring it goes up as far north as North Carolina, breeding along the coast; in these various localities it bears the name of water crow, Grecian lady, water turkey, and cormorant."—Ripley & Dana: Amer. Cyclop., v, 692.

water-tuyere, water-twyer, s.

Metall.: A tuyere so constructed that cold water is made to flow in a continuous stream around a blast of air.

water-twist, s.

Cotton-mamuf.: Yarn made by the water-frame (q.v.).

water-twyer, s. [WATER-TUYERE.]

water-vascular, a.

Biol.: A term applied to a system of canals in the Annuloidea. They communicate with the exterior, and open internally into the perivisceral cavity. Their function is not certainly known, but they are probably excretory and respiratory.

water-vine, s.

Botany:

1. Phytocrene gigantea, a large climber occurring in Martaban. The wood, which is soft and porous, discharges when wounded a quantity of pure, tasteless, and wholesome fluid, drunk by the natives.

2. Tetracera potatoria, a climber about twenty feet long, with yellow flowers. A native of Sierra Leons.

water-violet, s.

Bot.: The genus Hottonia (q.v.).

water-viper, s.

Zool.: Cenchrus plicatus; a venomous snake, about forty-four inches long, ranging over the southern states of the American Union from the Carolinas to Texas. Greenish-brown, yellowish on sides, banded with blackish-brown. Called also Cotton Mouth and Water Moccasin Snake.

water-vole, s.

Zool.: Arvicola amphibius, popularly known as the Water-rat. It is a small rodent, about a foot long, of which the tail occupies nearly five inches. Fur thick and shining, rich reddish-brown above, yellowish-gray beneath. These animals haunt the banks of rivers and ponds, and, though the feet are not webbed, swim with facility not only on the surface, but below the water. They have been accused of destroying fish-spawn, and feeding on young fish and even on ducklings, but the charge is probably unfounded, as their food appears to be entirely vegetable. Common in England, throughout Europe and Asia, to China. There is a black variety, common in Scotland and some parts of England, which has been described as a distinct species (A. atra).

water-wagtail, s.

Ornithology:

1. The Pied Wagtail, Motacilla lugubris, a well-known British bird. Length about seven inches; forehead, cheeks, sides of neck, and lower parts pure white; back and sides ash colour, the rest black; wing-coverts black, bordered with white, two outer tail-feathers white. In winter the black patch on throat is diminished to a circle.

2. (Pl.): Any species of the genus Metacilla as distinguished from Budytes (q.v.).

water-wash, s.

Bot.: The genus Ulva (q.v.).

water-way, s.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. That part of a river, arm of the sea, &c. through which vessels enter or depart; this fair-way.

2. A navigable stream, canal, or the like.

"They have decided to lay down light rails along the banks of this water-way, which is their own property, and to tow the barges with small steam-engines instead of with horses."—Daily Chronicle, May 4, 1888.

II. Shipbuild.: A strake on the inside of a vessel above the ends of the beams. It is bolted downward through the beam and shelf, and laterally through the futtock and planking. It is also secured by a fore-and-aft dowel to the beam. It forms a channel to lead the water to the scupperns. In iron vessels this water-ways assume many different forms.

"A god-sized stern locker and water-ways."—Field, Feb. 11, 1888.

*water-weak, a. Weak as water; very feeble.

"If I lustle now, forthwith am water-weak."
Dante: Divine Comedy, p. 10.

water-weed, s.

Bot.: A common name for aquatic plants generally, but applied specifically to Anacharis alinastrum, or Water-thyme.

water-wheel, s.

Hydraulics:

1. A kind of wheel for raising water in large quantities.

2. A wheel moved by water, and employed to turn machinery. There are four principal kinds of water-wheels—the overshot wheel, the undershot wheel, the breast wheel, and the turbine (see these terms).

3. The paddle-wheel of a steamer water-willow, s.

"The natives kept perpetually harassing our waterers with stones."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. v., ch. iv.

wâ-têr-fâll, s. [Eng. water, and fall.]

1. A fall or perpendicular descent of the water of a river or stream, or a descent nearly perpendicular; a cascade, a cataract.

"But it is not to list to the waterfall That Paristina leaves her hall."
—Byron: Paristina, II.

¶ A waterfall tends slowly to recede up the stream on which it exists. This retrogression is greatly aided when the strata consist of alternate hard and soft beds dipping up the stream. The running water and the spray soon scoop out the soft beds, leaving the harder ones without adequate support, and causing masses of them to fall from time to time. As the waterfall recedes, a gorge is left on the parts of the stream from which it has gradually moved back. The gorge below the falls of Niagara produced by the recession of the great cataract extends seven miles, and must, as Sir Charles Lyell has shown, have required some thousand years for its excavation. A similar gorge on the Rhine, from Bingen to Rolandseck, cut by a now departed waterfall, is sixty miles long. Just beneath the waterfall there is a hole like a "swallow-hole." It is often called a kettle. It has a spiral form, and may be four times as deep as wide, or of less proportion. It is excavated by an eddy carrying round pebbles.

2. A neckcloth or scarf that comes down over the breast.

3. A chignon (q.v.). (Colloq.)

"In a gaudy-figured sash waistcoat and waterfall of the same material."—Hughes: Tom Brown at Oxford.

† Sometimes used attributively.

wá-tër-spóut, s. [Eng. water, s., and spout.]

Meteor.: A remarkable phenomenon occurring for the most part at sea, but occasionally on land, though generally in this latter case in the neighbourhood of water. A water-spout at sea is usually formed in the following manner: a dense cloud projects from its centre a body of vapour, in form something like a sugar-loaf with the point downward. This cone is agitated by the wind until it assumes a spiral form, and gradually dips more and more towards the sea, where a second cone is formed having its point upward. The clouds above and the water below are violently agitated by the physical influence at work. Suddenly the descending and ascending cones of water or vapour meet in mid-air, and form one united pillar which moves onward vertically to calm weather, but obliquely to the horizon when acted on by the wind. The junction of the two cones is generally accompanied by an electric flash. After continuing in this form for a short time the waterspout bursts, in some cases with terrific violence, and to the destruction of anything in the vicinity. Many a ship has been overwhelmed in this manner, and sunk in a moment with all on board. In November, 1855, five vessels were destroyed by a waterspout in the harbour of Tunis.

"Waterspouts on land" are phenomena of a different description, being merely heavy falls of rain of a very local character, usually known in the United States as cloudbursts. They are often destructive. On Aug. 30, 1878, the town of Miskolcz, in Hungary, was destroyed by one with considerable loss of life. These phenomena are, however, more common in India than in Europe. One which occurred at Dum-Dum, near Calcutta, was ascertained to be 1,500 feet in height, and it deluged half a square mile of territory to a depth of six inches. The cause of these phenomena has been assumed to be (1) electricity; (2) vortical motion; or (3) a combination of these causes. M. Weyher has, however, succeeded in producing them artificially, and his method shows that vortical motion is the great factor in the production of waterspouts. By means of a rotating tourniquet placed over cold water, an aerial eddy is caused which draws up the water, in the form of a spout composed of drops, to a considerable height; when the water is heated a clearly defined waterspout is seen. With from 1,500 to 2,000 rotations per minute, the vapour from heated water condenses into a visible sheath, enveloping a clearly defined and rarefied nucleus, conical, and tapering downwards. As in natural marine spouts, water-drops are carried up and thrown out beyond the influence of the upward current.

wá-tër-tíght (gh silent), a. [Eng. water, and tight.] So light as to retain or not to admit water.

* Sufficiently watertight for use without caulking. — Cook: First Voyage, bk. 1, ch. xviii.

"He that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed."—James i. 6.

2. Anything resembling a wave in character or appearance; as—

(1) One of a series of undulating inequalities on a surface; an undulation; a swelling outline.

"Without whose numberless waves or curls, which usually arise from sand-holes a little smoothed in polishing with putty."—Newton.

(2) The undulating streak or line of lustre on cloth, watered and calendered.

(3) Anything which advances and recedes, rises and falls, comes and goes, or increases and diminishes with some degree of regular recurrence, like a wave: as, a wave of prejudices, a wave of popularity, &c.

3. Water. (Poetical.)

"By the salt wave of the Mediterranean."

Shakspeare: Lear's Labour's Lost, v. 1.

*4. A throng of people borne along together. (Shakspeare: Cymbeline, v. 3.)

5. A waving or undulating motion; a signal made by waving the hand, a flag, or the like.

II. Physics: An undulation; a movement which, though it seems progressive, is in reality only up and down, or, to a certain extent, to and fro, though it is transmitted to a distance by the fact that at each successive point the otherwise similar motion of a single particle takes place a little later in time = the time which it takes for the motion to be communicated from the preceding moving particle. Waves exist in water, in air (sound-waves), in ether (light-waves), &c. [SOUND, UNDULATORY-THEORY.] A wave upon the open ocean alternately rises into a ridge and sinks into a depression (the trough of the sea). Anything floating, say a quantity of sargasso sea-weed, rises on a billow and sinks again as the wave falls, without otherwise changing its place. Even the undulatory movement affects the water only to a few feet in depth, where, unless there are submarine currents, all is still. When a wave comes inshore and enters a narrow gulf, it becomes affected both by the return of the reflex waves from its sides and the friction of the bottom, if the water be shallow, so that instead of a movement mainly up and down, it now becomes progressive, and breaks in a series of billows on the sands or rocks. In the former case the water runs up the sand, and then recedes considerably before the next wave comes in. Sea waves are mainly caused by the wind. If a breeze blowing off the shore cause ripples near the land, these will rise higher the farther they are from the shore if the cause which brought them into being continues to operate. Out on the open ocean they rise to some feet in elevation, but it is a great exaggeration to call them "mountains high": they have, however, been witnessed approximately sixty feet from trough to summit in the Atlantic. When they rise into a sharp ridge, and the wind is strong, they crest over, break, and fall on the leeward side with abundant spray; but this does not occur on the ocean to the same extent as near shore. The force of waves is so great that, geologically viewed, they are a potent force in altering the conformation of coasts. When in a storm they break with transcendent force on a shore they scoop out soft shales into caves, allowing the harder rocks above in time to fall in, or they break off portions of those harder rocks themselves, besides grinding against each other any fallen slabs which may already be lying on the beach.

wave-borne, a. Borne or carried on or by the waves.

wave-breast, s.

Judaism: The breast of an animal which has been offered in sacrifice used as a wave-offering (q.v.).

wave-length, s. The distance between the crests of two adjacent waves, or between the lowest parts of the depressions on each side of a wave.

wave-line principle, s.

Ship-build.: The principle of building ships with contours scientifically adapted to the curves of the sea-waves they have to traverse. It was introduced by Mr. Scott Russell in consequence of experiments made by him in 1834. Two years later a Committee of the British Association was appointed to report on the subject. The principle is now generally adopted.

wave-loaf, s.

Judaism: A loaf for a wave-offering (q.v.).

wave-moths, s. pl.

Entom.: The Acidalidae, a family of Geometer Moths.

wave-motion, s. Motion in curves alternately concave and convex, like that of the waves of the sea; undulatory motion.

wave-offering, s.

Judaism: Heb. תְּנוּפָח (tenuphah) = agitation, tumult, a wave-offering, from פָּח (nuph) = to agitate, to wave. An offering which is believed by the Rabbis to have been waved to the four points of the compass, "before the Lord," as an acknowledgment of his sovereignty over the earth. It is often combined with the similar heave-offering, believed to have been waved upwards as an acknowledgment of his rule over heaven. It is connected also with the peace-offering, of which it, as a rule, constituted a part. When an animal was presented in sacrifice, the shoulder was often offered as a heave-offering and the breast as wave-offering. [WAVE-BREAST.] Both afterwards became the perquisites of the priests. On the second day of the Passover a sheaf was waved. At Pentecost two lambs of the first year were to be offered as a peace-offering, and both were to be waved, (Lev. x. 14, xxiii. 11-15, 20; Numb. vi. 20, xviii. 11.)

"And waved them for a wave-offering before the Lord."—Lev. viii. 27.

Physics: Any radial line along which an earthquake is propagated from its origin. [SEISMIC-CENTRE.]

wave-shell, s.

Physics: One of the waves of alternate compression and expansion, propagated during an earthquake in all directions from the seismic centre to the earth's surface. Theoretically these should have the form of concentric shells; but, as the earth's crust is made up of rocks varying greatly in density and elasticity, the waves will necessarily have greater velocity in one direction than in another, whilst the transit of the wave may be interrupted by breach of continuity in the transmitting medium. (Encyc. Brit.) wave-trap, s.

Hydr. Eng.: A widening inward of the sides of piers, to afford space for storm-waves which roll in at the entrance to spread and extend themselves.

wave-wine, s.

Bot.: Convolvulus, or Calystegia sepium, and Convolvulus arvensis. (Britten & Holland.)

wave-worn, a. Worn by the waves.

"The wave-worn horns of the echoing bank."
Tennyson: Ulysses, 39.

wāve (1), v.t. & t. [A.S. wafjan; cogn. with O. Icel. vafa, vafra, vafa = to waver; vaf = hesitation; vifa, vifa, vafa = to swing, to vibrate; M. H. Ger. waben = to wave; waberen, wabelen, wabelen = to fluctuate.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To be moved loosely one way and the other; to play loosely; to float, to flutter.

"Those Iotemen . . . saw the banners and standards wave with the wynde."—Berners: Proisart; Cronycle, vol. 1, ch. ciii.

2. To be moved as a signal; to beckon.

*3. To waver; to be in an unsettled state; to hesitate, to fluctuate.

"He waved indifferently betwixt doing them neither good nor harm."—Shakspeare: Coriolanus, II. 2.

B. Transitive:

"King Helenus waved high the Thracian blade."
Pope: Homer; Iliad xiii. 723.

2. To signify, command, or denote by a waving motion; to indicate by a wave of the hand or the like; to give a waving signal for.

"She spoke, and bowing waved Dismissal."
Tennyson: Princess, II. 84.

*3. To raise into irregularities of surface.

*4. To waft; to bear or carry through a buoyant medium.

ūte, ūt, ūre, amidst, wāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīro, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōra, wōlf, wōrk, wōh, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, ūnite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

5. To attract the attention of, or to direct, by a waving motion; to signal by waving the hand or the like; to beckon.

"It waves me forth again—I'll follow it." Shakespeare: Hamlet, I. 4.

wāve (2), v. l. [WAIVE.]

wāve, pret. of v. [WEAVE.]

wāved, pa. par. & a. [WAVE (1), v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb).

B. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Moved to and fro, or one way and the other; brandished.

* 2. Variegated in lustre; watered.

"The wavy water channel was from the beginning esteemed the richest and bravest wearing."—P. Hollant: Plinie, bk. viii., ch. xliiii.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: [UNDULATED, 2.]

2. Entom.: Having the margin of the body indented with a series or succession of arched segments or incisions.

3. Her.: The same as ONDÉ (q.v.).

wāve-lōss, a. [Eng. wave, s.; -less.] Free from waves; not waving; not disturbed or agitated; still.

wāve-lēt, s. [Eng. wave, s.; dimin. suff. -let.] A little wave; a ripple on water.

"How the wavesetle laugh and gladden." Longfellow: Drinking Song.

wāve-like, a. [Eng. wave, s., and like.] Like or resembling a wave or waves.

wā-vōil-ite, s. [After Dr. Wavell, who discovered it; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral, mostly occurring in globular or hemispherical groups of radiating crystals. Hardness, 3.25 to 4; sp. gr., 2.337; lustre, vitreous, sometimes resinous; colour, white, shades of yellow, green, gray, brown, black. Compos.: phosphoric acid, 34.4; alumina, 37.3; water, 28.3 = 100, which is equivalent to the formula, 3Al₂O₃2PO₅ + 12H₂O.

wāv-ēr, v. i. [A freq. from wave (1), v.; A.S. wæfira = wandering, restless; cogn. with Icelandic wafra = to hover about; Norw. varra = to flap about.]

1. To play or move here and there, or to and fro; to move one way and the other; to flutter.

"It wavers as long as it is free, and is at rest when it can choose no more."—Bp. Taylor: Sermons, vol. iii., ser. 7.

2. To be unsettled in opinion; to be undetermined; to fluctuate, to hesitate, to vacillate.

"His authority and example had induced some of his brethren, who had at first wavered, to resign their benches."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvii.

* 3. To be in danger of falling or failing; to totter, to reel.

"Though it were waverunge and in daunger to fall."—Sir T. Elyot: Governour, bk. i., ch. xi.

wāv-ēr, s. [Prob. from wave, s.] A sapling or young timber-tree. (Evelyn.)

wāv-ēr-ers, s. [Eng. waver, v.; -er.] One who wavers, hesitates, or vacillates; one who is unsettled in opinion.

"But come, young waverer, come, go with me." Shakespeare: Romeo & Juliet, ii. 3.

wāv-ēr-īng, pr. par., a., & s. [WAVER, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

"Its wavering image there."

Longfellow: The Bridge.

C. As subst.: Doubt; unsettled state of mind.

"The people war in a wavering."—Udal: Luta vl.

wāv-ēr-īng-lý, adv. [Eng. waver, v.; -ly.]

In a wavering, hesitating, or vacillating manner; with hesitation, doubt, or vacillation.

"Lose not waveringly about you."—Udal: I Peter, ch. v.

wāv-ēr-īng-nēss, s. [Eng. wavering; -ness.] The quality or state of being wavering; hesitation, doubt, vacillation.

"The waveringness of our cupidities."—Montague: Devout Exercises. (Fret.)

wāve-sōn, s. [Etym. doubtful, but prob. connected with wāf rather than wave.] A term applied to goods which, after shipwreck, appear floating on the sea.

wāv-ī-nēss, s. [Eng. wavy; -ness.] The quality or state of being wavy.

wāv-ure, s. [Eng. wave (2), v.; -ure.] The act of waving or putting off.

wāv-ý, *wāv-īe, a. [Eog. waw(e), s.; -ý.]

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. Rising or swelling in waves; full of waves.

"Thirde hollow bottom'd banks divide the wavy sea." Chapman: (Todd).

2. Showing undulations or fluctuations of any kind; rising and falling as in waves; moving or playing to and fro.

"Long wavy wreaths." Cooper: Task, v. 154.

Of flowers.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: [UNDULATED, 2.]

2. Her.: Ondé (q.v.).

wāwe, s. [Icel. wagr; Dan. vovs; Ger. woge.]

A wave.

wāw-lý, a. [WALV.]

wāx, s. [A.S. weax; cogn. with Dut. was; Icel. & Sw. var; Dan. var; Ger. wachs; Russ. vosk; Lith. woskas.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The same as SEALING-WAX (q.v.).

2. Cernuex (q.v.).

3. A rage. (Schoolboys' slang.)

"She's in a terrible wax."—H. Kingsley: Ravenshoe, ch. 7.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: Any substance more or less resembling beeswax. Secretions or excretions of such a kind exist as a delicate bloom on the plum; as dense agglomerations of rods or needles on the leaf of the rye; as simple coatings or granules on the "frosted" leaves of many lilies, as coatings of rods standing vertically on the surface of the cuticle, as on the leaves of the banana, or as incrustations, as in Opuntia. (Thomé.)

2. Chem.: A term originally restricted to beeswax, but now extended to various bodies possessing similar characters, found widely diffused in the vegetable kingdom, occurring as a coating on various parts of plants, as leaves, fruits, &c. They contain but a small proportion of oxygen, and appear to consist of the higher members of the fatty acids, combined with alcohol radicals. At ordinary temperatures they are more or less hard, become soft when warmed, and melt below 100°; insoluble in water, slightly soluble in alcohol, but soluble in ether, in chloroform, and in the fixed and volatile oils. Candles of beeswax are manufactured by pouring melted wax upon the wicks until of proper thickness, when they are rolled while still plastic on a marble slab. It makes excellent candles, which have a pleasant odor, but is too high priced to be much used for this purpose. It is employed for waxing polished floors, as an ingredient in some varnishes, and in making lithographic crayons. The ancients made much use of wax for writing tablets, it being easy to obliterate the writing by the blunt end of the stylus. The art of modelling portraits and figures in wax is of prehistoric date. The Greeks were very skillful in this art, and the Romans had wax portraits of their ancestors hung in their house entrances, as proof of ancient pedigree. Wax modelling in figures, flowers, &c., is still a popular art. Much wax is produced in the United States, while the myrtle-berry (Myrica cerifera) yields a waxy substance much used in candle-making. Similar plants are found in South America and Africa. [BEESWAX, CHINESE-WAX, MINERAL-WAX, SPERMACETI.]

3. Manuf. & Comm.: Vegetable wax is believed to have been used for candles in China earlier than in Europe. It was first employed in England for the purpose in the twelfth century.

4. Pharm.: Wax is emollient and demulcent; it is used in the preparation of ointments, plasters, &c.

wāx-basket, s. A fancy basket made of wire and coated with wax. (Simmóns.)

wāx-bill, s. [WAXBILL.]

wāx-candle, s. A candle made of wax.

wāx-chandler, s. A maker or seller of wax-candles.

wāx-cloth, s. A popular but erroneous name for floor-cloth (q.v.).

wāx-cluster, s.

Bot.: Gaultheria hispidula. The berries are white, with a taste somewhat like that of the gooseberry, but more bitter. Found in Tasmania.

wāx-coal, s.

Min.: The same as Pyropissite (q.v.).

wāx-doll, s. A child's doll made entirely or partly of wax.

wāx-end, waxed-end, s. A shoemaker's sewing-thread covered with resin (shoemaker's wax), and having a bristle fastened at the end, to enable it to lead through the hole made by the awl.

wāx-flower, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: An artificial flower made of wax.

2. Bot.: Clusia insignia. [CLUSIA.]

wāx-insect, s.

Entom.: Coccus sinensis, or Peltis, a small white insect, a native of China, valuable on account of the wax it produces. It feeds chiefly on a kind of annachi (Rhus succedaneum), and the wax is deposited on the branches as a coating which resembles hoarfrost. This is scraped off and used for making candles. [CERVL-CEROTATE.]

wāx-kernel, s. A kind of concretion in the flesh.

"A fountain in her neck was much intamed, and many wax-kernels about it."—Hesman: Surgery.

wāx-light, s. A taper made of wax.

wāx-modelling, s. The act or art of making models and figures in wax. Called also the Ceroplastic Art. The process has been generally superseded by that of clay and sand modelling, though wax is still employed by silversmiths.

wāx-moth, s.

Entom.: Any individual of the family Galleriidae (q.v.); appecif, Galleria mellonella, the larva of which feeds on wax to hives.

wāx-myrtle, s.

Bot.: Myrica cerifera. [BAWBERRY, 2, CANDLEBERRY, MYRTLE.]

wāx-opal, s.

Min.: A variety of opal, presenting a waxy lustre on fracture surfaces.

wāx-painting, s. The same as ENCAUSTIC-PAINTING (q.v.).

wāx-palm, s.

Bot.: Humboldt's name for Cerroylon andicola, a fine palm, growing in the Andes of New Grenada, near the sources of the Magdalena and Cauca rivers. It has a straight stem, somewhat thicker at its middle part than above or below, and terminating above in a tuft of six or eight large pinnate leaves. The flowers, which are polygamous, are in panicles, the calyx of three small scales, the petals three, the stamens numerous, with short filaments; the fruit, a small round drupe with a single seed. The trunk is covered by a coating of wax, which exudes from the space between the insertion of the leaves. According to Vaupelin, this wax is a concrete inflammable substance, consisting of one-third of actual wax and two-thirds of resin.

wāx-paper, s. A kind of paper prepared by spreading over its surface a coating made of white wax, turpentine, and spermaceti.

* wāx-red, a. Of a bright-red colour, resembling that of sealing-wax.

"Set thy seal-mauin on my wax-red lips." Shakespeare: Venus & Adonis, 516.

* wāx-scot, s. A duty anciently paid twice a year towards the charge of wax-candles to churches.

wāx-tree, s.

1. A name common to plants of the genus Vismia (q.v.). The wax-tree of Guiana is Vismia guianensis; that of Cayenne, V. cayanensis. These, with all other species of the genus, yield a waxy or resinous juice.

bēll, bōy; pōut, jōwī; oat, cell, chorns, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -īng. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = shūn. -cious, -tious, -alous = shūs. -hie, -die, &c. = hēl, dēl.

2. Ligustrum lucidum. A kind of vegetable wax is said to be obtained from it in China.

wax-wing, s. [WAXWING.]

wax-work, s.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Work executed in wax, esp., figures formed in wax in imitation of real beings; also, anatomical preparations in wax, models of fruit, flowers, &c. The art of modelling in wax is very ancient; the Romans used to set up wax images of their ancestors in the atrium of their houses. (Sallust: Jug., iv. 6.)

2. (Pl.) An exhibition of wax figures representing celebrated or notorious characters; the place where a collection of such figures is exhibited.

"Wax-works is the kind of a business as a man gets used to and friendly with, after a manner."—Scribner's Magazine, Aug., 1877, p. 467.

II. Bot.: Celastrus scandens, a native of North America. The name is given from the scarlet covering of the seeds. [CELASTRUS.]

wax-worker, s.

1. One who works in wax; a maker of wax-work.

2. A bee which makes wax.

wax (1), v.t. [WAX, s.] To smear or rub with wax; to apply wax to; to treat or join with wax.

"Unequal in their length, and waxed with care."—Dryden: Ovid; Metamorphoses I.

wax (2), *waxe, *wox (pa. t. waxed, *wex, *wox; pa. par. waxed, *waxen, *woxen, *wozen), v. t. [A.S. weaxan (pa. t. wæx, pa. par. ge-wæxan); cogn. with Dut. wassen; Icel. vaxa; Dan. væxe; Sw. växa; Ger. wachsen; Goth. wachjan. From the same root come Lat. augeo = to increase; vigo = to flourish; Eng. eke, vigour, &c.]

1. To increase in size; to become larger; to grow. (Couper: Nature Unimpaired by Time.)

2. To pass from one state to another; to become.

"We may observe it growing with age, waxing bigger and stronger."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. 1, ser. 4.

wax-bill, s. [Eng. wax, and bill (1).]

Ornith.: A popular name for Swainson's genus Estrela, from the waxy-red colour of their bills. Estrela amandava is the Red, and E. formosa the Green Waxbill.

"In the form of their beak the Waxbills, as Blyth calls them, deviate towards the Finches and Linnets."—Jerdon: Birds of India, II. 354.

wax-en, a. [Eng. wax, s.; -en.]

1. Made or consisting of wax.

"Within the cave the clustering bees attend Their waxen works, or from the roof depend."—Pope: Homer; Odyssey XIII. 181.

2. Covered with wax; waxed over.

"To pitch the waxen flooring some contrive."—Dryden: Virgil; Georgic IV. 237.

* 3. Resembling wax; soft as wax; im-pressible. (Shakespeare: Rape of Lucrece, I, 240.)

waxen chatterer, s.

Ornith.: The Bohemian Waxwing (q.v.).

wax-er, s. [Eng. wax (1), v.; -er.] One who or that which waxes; specif., an attachment to wax the thread in a sewing machine used for shoemaking, harness-making, &c.

wax-i-ness, s. [Eng. waxy; -ness.] The quality or state of being waxy.

wax-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [Wax (1), v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. The process of finishing leather.

2. The treatment of thread with soft wax in the sewing-machine for boots and shoes.

3. The process of stopping out colours in calico-printing.

wax-wing, s. [Eng. wax, s., and wing.]

Ornith.: A popular name for any species of the genus Ampelis (= † Bonbycilla), from the fact that in two of the three species the secondary and tertiary quills terminate in horny expansions of the shaft, somewhat resembling pieces of red sealing-wax. Ampelis garrula, the European or Bohemian Waxwing (q.v.), and A. cedrorum, the American Waxwing or Cedar-bird (q.v.), have these spots; but they are absent in A. phœnicoptera, the Asiatic or Japanese Waxwing.

wax'-y, *wax'-ey, a. [Eng. wax, s.; -y.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Made or consisting of wax; abounding in wax.

2. Resembling wax in appearance, softness, plasticity, impressibility, or the like; hence, yielding, pliable, impressionable.

"He is servile in imitation, waxy to persuasions."—Bp. Hall: Characteristics, bk. II.

3. Angry, cross. (Schoolboys' slang.)

"I could make him a little waxy with me."—Dickens: Bleak House, ch. xxiv.

II. Bot.: Having the texture and colour of new wax, as the pollen masses of various orchids. [CERACEOUS.]

waxy-degeneration, s.

Pathol.: The transformation of the liver into a tough substance resembling yellow wax, the organ increasing ultimately in weight till it weighs eight or nine instead of three to four pounds. The disease is constitutional, comes on insidiously, and is incurable. Called also Amyloid, Albuminous, Lardaceous, or Scrofulous Degeneration of the Liver.

waxy-infiltration, s.

Pathol.: The infiltration of waxy matter into any organ of the body. The most highly-developed and dangerous form of it is waxy degeneration of the liver (q.v.).

waxy-kidney, s.

Pathol.: A kidney affected by lardaceous disease (q.v.).

waxy-yellow, a. & s.

Bot.: Dull yellow with a soft mixture of reddish-brown.

*wāy (1), *waye, v.t. [WEIGH.]

*wāy (2), v.t. & i. [WAY, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To go in; to proceed along.

2. To go or journey to.

3. To put in the way; to teach to go in the way; to break to the road. (Said of horses.)

B. Intrans. To journey, to travel, to go.

"On a time, as they together wāy."—Spenser: F. Q., IV. II. 12.

wāy, *waye, *wey, *weye, s. [A.S. weg; cogn. with Dut. weg; Icel. veigr; Dan. vej; Sw. väg; O. H. Ger. wec; Ger. weg; Goth. wigs; Lat. via; Saosc. vaha = a road, from vah = to carry.]

¶ As a proper name it is applied to a valley or tract of country lying between the north and south downs of Kent and Sussex.

Weald-clay, s.

English Geol.: The upper series of strata of the Wealden formation. It is about 1,000 feet thick, and, with the exception of its upper portion, which is fluvio-marine, is of freshwater origin. It constituted the delta of a great river, which, slowly subsided till at length the ocean was let in. The delta was inhabited by great Saurians, of the genera Iguanodon, Hypsilophodon, Pelorosaurus, Ornithomys, and Hylaeosaurus. These, becoming submerged as the delta sank, became imbedded, not in the Weald clay, but in the overlying Kentish Rag which succeeded the clay, and rests on it conformably. Throughout the clay itself are casts of Cypridae, and there are occasional bands of Sussex marble composed almost entirely of a species of Paludina. The Weald clay constitutes a valley between the elevated ridges of the Hastings Sand and the chalk downs of Kent, Surrey, Hampshire, and Sussex, from Hythe by Tunbridge, Hartingcombe, and Hailsham to Pevensey.

Weald-en, a. & s. [Eng. wald; -en.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a weald; specifically, pertaining to the weald of Kent and Sussex, or to the formation described under B.

B. As substantive:

English Geol.: A group of rocks consisting of clay, shale, sand, sandstones, grists, and limestones, constituting the lowest part of the Cretaceous system. In 1822 Mr. Gideon Algonon Mantell (afterwards Dr. Mantell, F.R.S.) correctly showed that it was of fluvial origin, though intercalated between marine Oolite below, and Greensand, also marine, above. The name, Wealden Formation, was first introduced by Mantell, to whom it had been suggested by his friend J. P. Martin, Esq., of Pulborough. The Wealden has been generally divided into the Weald Clay, constituting the upper beds, the Hastings Sand in the middle, and Purbeck beds below; but the Purbeck beds are now considered to be Oolite, or to be intermediates between the Oolite and the Wealden. The thickness of the true Wealden formation in Swanage Bay, where it is most highly developed, may be 2,000 feet. Its fauna consists of great reptiles, fishes of the genus Lepidotus, and freshwater molluscs, Physa, Limnaea, &c.; its flora of Conifers, Cycads, and Ferns, but no Dicotyledonous Angiosperms. The delta of the old Wealden river has been traced about two hundred miles from east to west, and a hundred miles from north to south. Much has been swept away by denudation. The Quorra or Niger in Africa covers 25,000 square miles; the Wealden river therefore probably approached, and may possibly have exceeded it in magnitude. It drained a large part of a continent, the area and exact situation of which are unknown. The Wealden of Hanover and Westphalia constitutes the delta of a second river distinct from the first. [WEALD-CLAY, HASTINGS-SAND, PURBECK-BEDS.]

weald-ish, a. [Eng. wald; -ish.] Of or belonging to a weald, and especially to the weald of Kent and Sussex.

"The wealdish man."—Faller: Worthies; Kent.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A general term for the atmospheric conditions, or the state of the air, with special reference to the questions of cold or heat, pressure, dryness, humidity, presence or absence of rain, occurrence of sunshine, or any other meteorological phenomena: as warm weather, dry weather, wet weather, stormy weather, hazy weather, &c. The science which investigates the causes of these changes of the atmosphere, and attempts to trace them to their origin is called Meteorology (q.v.).

"When the wind is thus settled, we have commonly fair weather." Dampier: Discourse of Winds, ch. l.

¶ In some tropical countries the seasons are so regular that the weather for any particular month may be predicted long beforehand without any considerable liability to error. For instance, it may safely be said that from November 1 to June 1 in Central India there will be only two or three rainy days, while between June 15 and September 15 there will be few days that are not rainy. [MOONSON, SEASON.] Prediction in any particular year in temperate climates, especially to Western Europe, is much more liable to error, though on a series of years there is tolerable uniformity, so that such expressions have arisen as March winds, April showers, and November fogs. The popular belief that the weather can be predicted by noting the changes of the moon is erroneous. Most other popular notions regarding weather signs are more or less accurate. In predicting the weather in Great Britain the meteorologists labor under this great disadvantage, that the approach, say, of a depression from the Atlantic, the ordinary precursor of a storm, cannot be telegraphed till it has reached the west coast of Ireland. If, on the contrary, a storm crossing the United States from the far west be moving towards New York, its progress can be telegraphed to that city whenever it reaches the states adjoining the Rocky Mountains.

* 2. Change of the state of the air.

* 3. Hence, fig., vicissitude, change of condition.

"An ancient family, which has stood against the waves and weathers of time." Bacon.

* 4. A light rain; a shower. (Wycliffe: Deuteronomy xxxii. 2.)

* 5. Wind.

* 6. A storm, a tempest.

"Roaring louder than the sea or weather." Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, III. a.

* 7. Bad, wet, or inclement weather.

"Seynge this bysshop with his company sytting in the weater." Fabyon: Chronycle, ch. lxxviii.

8. The inclination or obliquity of the sails of a windmill to the plane of revolution.

II. Naut.: The side of the vessel exposed to the wind; in contradistinction to the lee or leeward side, which is away from the wind.

B. As adjective:

Naut.: Towards the wind; windward. (Used frequently in composition: as, weather-quarter, weather-gauge, &c.)

¶ * (1) To make fair weather: To flatter; to conciliate by fair words and a show of friendship. [FAIR-WEATHER, 2.]

"I must make fair weather yet awhile." Shakesp.: Henry VI., v. l.

(2) To make good (or bad) weather:

Naut.: To behave well (or ill) in a storm; to ship little (or much) water.

weather-anchor, s.

Naut.: The anchor lying to windward, by which the ship rides when moored.

weather-beaten, a. Beaten by the wind; seasoned by exposure to all sorts of weather.

"Weather-beaten old seamen who had risen from being cabin-boys to be Admirals." Macauley: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

¶ It is probable that wester-besten should really be weather-bitten (q.v.). In some cases it is undoubtedly a corruption of the latter word: as in Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, v. 2:—

"Like a weather-bitten conduit."

* weather-bit, * weather-bitten, a. [Cf. Sw. väderbiten = weather-bitten; Norw. vederbiten.] Bitten, nipped, or frozen by the weather. [WEATHER-BEATEN.]

* weather-blown, a. Weather-beaten; exposed.

"Strong Ensigne that for height is weather-blown." Chapman: Homer; Iliad II. 532.

weather-board, v.t. To nail boards upon, as on a roof or side of a house, lapping one over another, in order to prevent rain, snow, &c., from penetrating it.

weather-board, s.

I. Nautical:

(1) That side of a ship which is towards the wind; the windward side.

(2) A piece of plank placed in the ports of a ship when laid up in ordinary, and serving as a protection from bad weather. They are fixed in an inclined position, so as to turn off the rain without preventing the circulation of air.

2. Build. (Pl.):

Weather-boarding (q.v.).

weather-boarding, s.

Boards nailed with a lap on each other to prevent the penetration of rain, snow, &c., as on roofs, the sides of houses, &c.

weather-boarding gauge, s. [BOARDING-GAUGE.]

weather-bound, a. Delayed or restrained from sailing by bad weather.

weather-bow, s.

Naut.: The side of a ship's bow that is to windward.

weather-box, s. A kind of hygrometer, usually in the shape of a toy house, in which certain mechanical results from the weight or fixture of materials due to dampness are made to move a figure or pair of figures—a man and a woman on a poised arm, for instance, so that the former advances from his porch in wet, and the latter in dry weather.

HOUSE, WITH WEATHER-BOARDS.

weather-breeder, s. A fine day which is supposed to presage foul weather. (Prov.)

Weather Bureau, s. A bureau of the Department of Agriculture at Washington, having charge of the forecasting of weather, the issue of storm signals, &c., and generally the distribution of meteorological information weather-cloth, s.

Naut.: A long piece of canvas or tarpauling used to preserve the hammocks from injury by the weather, when stowed, or to defend persons from this wind and spray.

weather-cock, s. & v. [WEATHERCOCK.]

* weather-driven, a. Driven by winds or storms; forced by stress of weather.

weather-eye, s. The eyes that looks at the sky to forecast the weather.

¶ To keep one's weather-eye open (or awake): To be sharply on one's guard; to have or keep one's wits about one. (Slang.)

weather-fish, s.

Ichthy.: Misgurnus fossilis, called also the Mud-fish and Thunder-fish. It is about a foot in length, dark-brown above, flecked with black; sdbdomen orange, with black spots. In Germany and Austria it is regarded as a weather-protector, because it usually comes to the surface about twenty-four hours before bad weather, and moves about with unusual energy. This habit has sometimes led to its being confined in a glass globe as an animated barometer. (Seeley: Freshwater Fishes of Europe.)

weather-gage, s. [WEATHER-GAUGE.]

weather-gall, s. The same as WATER-GALL (q.v.).

weather-gauge, weather-gage, s.

I. Lit. & Naut.: The advantage of weather; specifically the position or station of one ship to the windward of another.

"Take a turn round the back o' the hill to gain the wind on them; and when thou'st got the weather-gage thou mayest drive them before thee as gently as so many innocuous lambs." Scott: Ivanhoe, ch. l.

* 2. Fig.: Advantage of position; superiority, vantage.

"Ware the line Of Rokeby once combined with mine, I gain the weather-gage of fate!" Scott: Rokeby, vi. 24.

weather-gaw, s. [WEATHER-GALL.]

weather-glass, s.

Physics: A popular name for a barometer (q.v.), the weather indications of which are often graduated thus:—

Height.	State of the weather.
31 inches	Very dry.
30 1/2 "	Settled weather.
30 "	Fine weather.
30 "	Variable.
29 1/2 "	Rain or wind.
29 1/4 "	Much rain.
29 "	Tempest.

weather-gleam, s. A peculiar clear sky near the horizon. (Prov.)

"You have marked the lighting of the sky just above the horizon when clouds are about to break up and disappear. Whatever name you gave it you would hardly improve on that of the weather-gleam, which in some of our dialects it bears." Trench: English Past & Present, lect. 5.

* weather-hardened, a. Weather-beaten; seasoned by exposure to the weather.

"A countenance weather-hardened as it was." Southey: Doctor, ch. ix.

† weather-harp, s. A large Æolian harp. (Rosseter.)

* weather-headed, a. Having a sheepish look. (Scotch.)

"That old weather-headed fool." Congreve: Love for Love, II. 7.

¶ Probably a corruption of wether-headed.

weather-helm, s.

Naut.: A ship is said to carry a weather-helm, when, owing to her having a tendency to gripe, the helm requires to be kept a little to windward, or a-weather, in order to prevent her head from coming up in the wind when sailing close-hauled.

* weather-house, s. A weather-box (q.v.). (Cowper: Task, l. 211.)

weather-line, s. The line where the trunk of a tree touches and rises above the soil, and is thus exposed to the weather.

"The weather-line, just by the surface of the earth, where the durability of timber is put to the severest test." Mudge: Pop. Guide to the Obs. of Nature.

ból, bóy; póut, jówl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bençh; go, gem; thin, þhis; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f
-cian, -tian = çhan. -tion, -sion = shün; -fion, -gion = zhün. -cions, -tious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bpl, dpl weather-mouldings, s. pl.

Arch.: Drip-stones or canopies over a door, intended to throw off the rain.

weather-proof, a. Proof against the weather; able to afford adequate protection against a tempest or to pass through one unimpaired.

"Our bark's not weather-proof."—Quarles: Hist. of Jonah, E. 1. b.

weather-prophet, s. One who foretells coming weather; one who is weather-wise.

weather-quarter, s.
Naut.: The quarter of a ship which is on the windward side.

weather-roll, s.
Naut.: The roll of a ship to the windward in a heavy sea, upon the beams. (Opposed to lee-burck.)

weather-shore, s.
Naut.: The shore which lies to windward of a ship.

weather-side, s.
Naut.: That side of a ship under sail upon which the wind blows, or which is to windward.

weather-spy, s. An astrologer; one who foretells the weather; a weather-prophet.
"A gulling weather-spy." Donne: Satire 1.

weather-stain, s. A stain or mark caused by exposure to the weather.
"With weather-stains upon the wall,
And stairways worn, and crazy doors."
Longfellow: Wayside Inn. [Prose]

weather-strip, s. A piece of board, rubber, or the like, which closes accurately the space between the shut door and the threshold.

weather-tide, s.
Naut.: The tide which sets against the lee-side of a ship, impelling her to windward.

weather-tiling, s.
Build.: Tiling placed in vertical position on the side of a house.

weather-vane, s. A vane; a weather-cock.

weather-wind, s.
Bot.: Convolvulus sepium.

weather-wise, a. Wise or skillful in foreseeing or predicting changes of the weather.

"After I perceived them to be weather-wise."—Eaught: Voyages, I. 261.

weather-wiser, s. Something which predicts or foretells the weather.
"The flowers of pimpernel, the opening and shutting of which are the countryman's weather-wiser."—Berchem: Physico-Theol., bk. 2.

weather-work, s. Defence or provision against the wind, sea, &c.
"To caulk the decks and inside weather-works of the ships."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. 1, ch. 111.

weather-worn, a. Worn by the action of or by exposure to the weather; weathered.

weather-wrack, s. Something damaged by exposure to the weather.
"You need not mistrust
A weather-wrack."
Beaumont & Fletcher: Wit at Several Weapons, II.

wěath'ēr, v. t. & i. [WEATHER, a.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

"1. To air; to expose to the air.
"Soaring through his wide empire of the air
To weather his broad sails."
Spenser: F. Q., V. ix. 42.

2. To bear up against and overcome, as danger or difficulty; to sustain the effects of or pass through without permanent injury or loss; as, To weather difficulties.

II. Technically:

I. Geol.: To cause to alter in colour, coherence, or composition, and to decay through the influence of the weather. (Spec. in the pa. and pr. par.) [WEATHEREN, 11. 2., WEATHERING, 11. 2.]

2. Nautical:

(1) To sail to the windward of; to pass to windward.
"Whilst Arethusa was on this (port) tack, Neptune had round again and weathered her, thus becoming leading vessel again."—Field, Sept. 4, 1888.

(2) To bear up against and come through, though with difficulty. (Said of a ship in a storm, as also of a captain or pilot.)

"Many a rough sea had he weather'd in her."
Tennyson: Inezel Arden, 185.

B. Intransitive:

Geol.: To undergo alteration tending to decomposition, to decay by the action of the weather.

¶ 1. To weather a point:

(1) Naut.: To gain a point toward the wind, as a ship.

(2) Fig.: To gain or accomplish a point against opposition.
"We have been tugging a great while against the stream, and have almost weathered our point; a stretch or two more will do the work."—Addison. [Todd.]

2. To weather out: To endure; to hold out to the end against.
"When we have pass'd these gloomy hours,
And weathered out the storm that beats upon us."
Addison. [Todd.]

wěath'ēr-cōck, *wed-yr-cōck, s. [Eng. weather, and cock, s.]

1. Lit.: A vane; a weather-vane; a figure placed on the top of a spire, steeple, roof, or the like, which turns with the wind, and shows its direction. So called because the figure of a cock, as an emblem of vigilance, was a favourite form of vane.

"He saw the gilded weathercock Swim in the moonlight as he passed."
Longfellow: Landlord's Tale.

2. Fig.: Any person or thing that turns easily and frequently; a fickle, inconstant person.
"Where had you this pretty weathercock?"
"I cannot tell what the dickens his name is; my husband had him of."—Shakspeare: Merry Wives, III. 2.

wěath'ēr-cōck, v. t. [WEATHERCOCK, s.]
To serve as a weathercock to or upon.
"Whose blazing wyvern weathercocked the spire."
Tennyson: Agincourt's Field, 17.

wěath'ēr-ed, a. [Eng. weather; -ed.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Seasoned by exposure to the weather; weather-beaten.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: Applied to surfaces which have a small slope or inclination given to them to prevent water lodging on them, as window-sills, the tops of classic cornices, and the upper surface of most flat stone-work.

"So much of the outer surface as protrudes from the wall is weathered, or sloped off to carry the water away."—Cassell's Technical Education, pt. 21, p. 294.

2. Geol.: Altered and more or less decomposed, disintegrated, or decayed through the operation of the weather.

wěath'ēr-īng, *wed-ēr-yng, s. [Eng. weather; -ing.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Weather.
"Which would have bene, with the weathering which we had, ten or twelve dayes worke."—Hackluyt: Voyages, III. 515.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: The act of giving an inclination, or the inclination given to a surface so as to enable it to throw off water.

2. Geol.: The disintegration and decay of rocks under the influence of the weather. The alternations of heat and cold often make rocks brittle. The freezing of water within their interstices also has a destructive effect. When rocks are composed of two or more minerals, which expand differently when heated, and contract differently when they become cold, a powerful destructive agency is established. The carbon dioxide of the air acts on rocks containing lime, and rain and wind remove the bicarbonate. Wind also at times raises sand, which scours the rocks and somewhat wastes them away. (Lyell.)

wěath'ēr-lī-něss, s. [Eng. weatherly; -ness.]
Naut.: The quality or state of being weatherly.

"The properties in a yacht which govern speed or weatherliness."—Field, April 4, 1888.

wěath'ēr-lý, a. [Eng. weather; -ly.]

Naut.: Applied to a ship when she holds a good wind; that is, when she presents so great a lateral resistance to the water, when close-hauled, that she makes very little leeway.

"It was considered desirable she should possess more weatherly power."—Field, Feb. 11, 1888.

wěath'ēr-mōst, a. [Eng. weather; -most.]
Naut.: Being furthest to the windward.
"The weathermost portion of the sail exerts very little power on the ship."—Field, Feb. 25, 1888.

wěath'ēr-ōl'ō-gý, s. [Eng. weather; -ology.] A humorously coined word to express the science of the weather. (Byron.)

wēave (1), *wēave (pa. t. *wōaf, *wōaved, wōove, pa. par. *wōowed, wōove, *wōovve), v. t. & i. [A. S. wēfan (pa. t. wōef, pa. par. wōefen); cogn. with Dut. woven; IceL. wéfa (pa. t. wōf, pa. par. wōfna); Dan. wæve; Sw. wéfa; Ger. weben (pa. t. wob, pa. par. gewoben); Sansc. vā, ve, vāp.]

A. Transitive:

1. To form by the interlacing of anything flexible, such as threads, yarns, filaments, or strips of different materials; to form by texture, or by the insertion and interlacing of one part of a material within another.

"The women wove hangings for the grove."—2 Kings xxiii. 7.

2. To form a texture with; to interlace or intertwine so as to form a fabric.
"When she wove the splendid silk."
Shakspeare: Pericles, IV. [Chorus.]

3. To entwine; to unite by intermixure or close connection; to unite closely or intimately.

"Those [notions] which are supposed woven into the very principles of their being."—Locke: Human Understanding, bk. 1, ch. II.

*4. To contrive, fabricate, or construct with design or elaborate care: as, To weave a plot.

B. Intransitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To practise weaving; to work with a loom.
"Whether they be . . . spinning, weaving, sowing, or brushing."—Fines: Instruct. of a Christian Woman, bk. II., ch. x.

2. To become woven or interwoven.
"The amorous vine which in the elm still weaves."
W. Browne.

II. Manège: To make a motion of the head, neck, and body from side to side, like the shuttle of a weaver. (Said of a horse.)

wēave (2), v. t. & i. [WAVE, v.]

A. Intrans.: To wave, to float, to fluctuate, to waver.
"Twixt life and death, long to and fro she wavered."
Spenser: F. Q., V. v. 10.

B. Trans.: To wave, to shake, to brandish.
"Shaking a pike . . . and waving their helmets."
Hackluyt: Voyages, III. 564.

wēaved, pret. & pa. par. of v. [WEAVE (1), v.] wēāv'ēr, *wēyv-ēr, s. [Eng. weave (1), v.; -er.]

I. Ord. Lang.: One who weaves; one whose occupation is to weave cloth, &c.
"Than weavers stretch your stays upon the waft."
Dryden: Virgil; Georgic I. 881.

II. Technically:

1. Ornith.: A weaver-bird (q. v.)

"Weavers prefer to build on trees where the long slender twigs droop to wards the ground, and so afford a nice vertical slender support."—Nature, May 31, 1888, p. 104.

2. Zool. (Pl.): The Tubitelæ (q. v.). (Griffiths: Currier, xiii. 404.)

weaver-bird, s.

Ornith.: A popular name for any species of the family Ploceidæ (q. v.). Both the scientific and trivial names of these birds have reference to the remarkable structure of their nests. The Weaver-birds are large finches, with somewhat elongated bodies, moderate wings, long tails, and very bright coats, the latter often varied in the breeding season. Yellow and yellowish-red are the prevailing tints, but species occur in which black, red, white, or gray predominate. The Weaver-birds are extremely social, and many of the species live in large colonies during the period of incubation. The nests of the various species differ considerably in shape and general structure, some (as the genus Oriolinus), building a separate nest for the male, while the female sits in another on her eggs, till relieved by her mate; others again contain more than one chamber, as that of the Golden Weaver-bird, Ploceus galbula; while the Social Weaver-birds, Ploceus or Phllosternus socius, construct an umbrella-like roof, under which from 800 to 1,000 separate nests have been found. But in all cases fibres, slender twigs, or blades of grass are the materials employed, the whole being tightly woven, after having been rendered more flexible and adhesive by the application of saliva. The nests themselves consist of a more or less globular portion, elongated into a tube below, with the entrance at the bottom or at the side. They are very generally suspended at the extremities of branches, and often over water, probably as affording security against monkeys, snakes, and other enemies. The Mahali Weaver-bird (Ploceus (aha)) is said to insert thorns into its nest, as a further protection against marauders. It is a noteworthy fact that the Golden Weaver-bird has begun to build on the telegraph-wires by the side of the railway in Natal, owing to the rapid destruction of the willows before advancing civilization (Nature, May 31, 1888).

Ornith. Any individual of the Ploceidae (q.v.).

"The Ploceidae, or Weaver-finches, are especially characteristic of the Ethiopian region."—Wallace: Geog. Diet. Animals, II, 236.

weaver-fish, s. [WEAVER.]

weaver's shuttle, s.

Zool. Ovulum volva. The popular name has reference to its shape.

* wēaw-ēr-ēs, s. [Eng. weaver; -ēs.] A female weaver.

"In the hands of an ancient weaver and weaveress."—J. B. Hunt: Hist. of Durstey, 222.

wēaw-īng, *wev-yng, pr. par., a., & s. [WEAVE (1), v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of one who weaves;

the act or process of producing cloth, &c., by the combination of flexible fibres. It is an art of very remote antiquity. The frame or apparatus on which cloth is woven is termed a loom (q.v.). In all kinds of weaving, whether plain or figured, one system of threads, called the warp or weft, is made to pass alternately under and over another system of threads called the warp, web, or chain. The essential operation of weaving is the successive raising of certain threads of the warp, and the depression of others for the reception of the weft shot. This operation is called shedding. The web, which is of any convenient length, is kept stretched between two parallel beams, fixed horizontally between upright standards. The one beam, on which the warp is wound, is called the yarn-roll, and the other on which the cloth is wound, the cloth-beam or roll. The weft-shot is introduced or carried through the shed by the shuttle. Weaving is performed by hand on hand-loom, and by steam or other motive power on power-loom. In its most general sense, the term comprehends not only the making of those textile fabrics prepared in the loom, but also net-work, lace-work, &c. Where the colour of the yarn in warp and weft is the same, the process is called plain weaving, and the result is a fabric of uniform colour, in which the warp and weft threads regularly interlace. Pattern weaving consists either in using different colours in warp or weft or in both, or in weaving with more complicated machines, or in combining both variations. Double weaving consists in weaving two webs simultaneously one above the other, and interweaving the two at intervals so as to form a double cloth. Kidderminster or Scotch carpeting is the chief example of this process. Pile weaving is the process by which fabrics like velvet, velveteen, corduroy, and Turkish carpets are produced. [LOOM (1), JACQUARD.]

¶ Though skins of animals formed the chief clothing material in the Stone Age, yet the arts of spinning and weaving were practised, spindle-whorls and fabrics (the material is flax, hemp being unknown) having been found in the Swiss lake-dwellings of that period. The art of weaving seems to have existed in China and in India from a remote period of antiquity. It is also represented in sculpture on the Egyptian monuments at Thebes. Women, many of them slaves or devotes attached to temples, wove fabrics in Greece and Rome, while in Egypt the work was performed by men. The primeval looms were everywhere rude, but the Hindoos, with humble machines, turn out excellent fabrics. In 1832 and 1831 continental weavers settled in England. Several inventions in the art of machine weaving were made in the eighteenth century, and in 1801 Jacquard exhibited in Paris the loom which bears his name, and which has been of inestimable service in the weaving of patterns in cloth. In 1809 Heathcoat invented the bobbin-net machine. Within the present century the art of weaving has made great progress, numerous inventions having been made in the United States and elsewhere.

wēaw-en, a. [A.S. wisanian = to become dry; Icel. visna = to wither, from visinn = withered, palsied, dried up; Dan. & Sw. vissen = withered; Sw. visna = to fade; O. H. Ger. wēsaren = to dry.] Thin, lean, wizened, withered.

weazen-faced, a. Wizen-faced, withered.

"The door . . . was opened, and a little blue-eyed, weazen-faced ancient man came creeping out."—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit, ch. xl.

wēb, webbe, s. [A.S. webb, web; cogn. with Dut. web, webbe; Icel. vefr, genit. vefar; Dan. væv; Sw. väf; O. H. Ger. weppi, wappi; Ger. gewebe. From the same root as weave (q.v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. That which is woven; the piece of cloth woven in a loom; & a texture.

"To compete with the costlier webe turned out at Spitalfields."—Standard, Oct. 30, 1885.

2. A piece of linen cloth.

3. The plexus of very delicate threads or filaments which a spider spins, and which serves as a web to catch flies and other insects for its food; & a cobweb.

"Over them Arachne hid did lift Her cunning web, and spread her subtle net."—Spenser: F. Q., II, vii, 28.

4. Hence, fig., anything carefully contrived and artfully put together or woven, as a plot, scheme, or trap.

"What a tangled web we weave When first we practise to deceive."—Scott: Marmion, vi, 17.

5. Something resembling a web or sheet of cloth; specif., a large roll of paper such as is used in the web-press for newspapers and the like.

6. Applied to any plain, flat surface; as—

(1) A sheet or thin plate of metal.

"And there with stately pompe by heapes they wend, And Christianse slaine rolle up in webs of led."—Faust: Godfrey of Boulogne, viii, 22.

(2) The blade of a sword.

"The brittle web of that rich sword, he thought, Was broke through harness of the countess shield."—Faust: Godfrey of Boulogne, vii, 4.

(3) The plate, or its equivalent, in a beam or girder which connects the upper and lower flat plates or laterally extending portions.

"This interval was strengthened by horizontal webs of iron plates."—Daily Telegraph, March 22, 1888.

(4) The corresponding portion between the tread and foot of a railway-rail.

(5) That portion of a wheel, as of a railway-carriage, which extends between the hub and the rim, occupying the space where spokes would be in an ordinary wheel.

(6) The blade of a saw.

(7) In vehicles, a stout band of textile fabric, used as straps to limit the extension of the hood.

(8) That portion of an ordinary anvil which is of reduced size below the head, and from which the divergent horns proceed.

(9) The solid portion of the bit of a key.

(10) The arm of a crank connecting the shaft and the wrist.

(11) The thin sharp part of the coultter of a plough.

II. Technically:

1. Entom.: The term web is sometimes used of the silky sheath formed by various caterpillars within the rolled leaves constructed for their habitation and defence, the cocoon of the silkworm, &c.

2. Ornith.: A membrane in the Swimming Birds, uniting the three anterior toes, and in one order (the Steganopodes) extending also along the side of the foot to the great toe. In a rudimentary form the web is found also in some waders.

3. Zool.: Chiefly in the sense I. 3. All spiders do not weave webs, and those which do vary in the more or less regular form of the web produced. Two of the finest weavers are the Garden Spider, Epeira diadema, and the web of which is of a fine geometric form, and the Common House Spider, Aranea domestica (SPINNERET). Used also of the membranes between the digits of some animals, which are especially adapted for swimming, or are amphibious, as the Orthorhynchus, the Otter, some breeds of Dogs, the Crocodiles, and the Water-lizards.

Bot.: A genus of Helipodiaceae. Herba or undershrubs with serrate or three-cleft leaves and yellow radiate and composit flowers, with a pappus of toothed or hairy scales. Natives of America. The leaves of Wedelia calendulacea, a composite with a slight camphoraceous smell, are used in India as a hair-dye and to promote the growth of hair. In Lohardagga, in Bengal, the root is pounded, and gives a black dye with salts of iron. (Calcutta Exhib. Report.) The leaves are considered to be tonic and alterative; the seeds, flowers, and leaves in decoction are deobstruent.

wéde (1), *wegge, s. [A.S. weg = a mass of metal, a wedge; cogn. with Dut. wig, wigge = a wedge; Icel. weggr; Dan. vægge; Sw. vigg; O. H. Ger. wekki, weggi; M. H. Ger. wèche = a wedge. From the same root as wag.]
 1. A piece of wood or metal, thick at one end and tapering to a thin edge at the other. It is a body contained under two triangular and three rectangular surfaces. The wedge is one of the mechanical powers, and is used for splitting wood, rocks, &c., for exerting great pressure, as in the oil-press [WEDGE-PRESS], and for raising immense weights, as when a ship is raised by wedgea driven under the keel. All cutting and penetrating instruments, as knives, swords, chisels, razors, axes, nails, pins, needles, &c., may be considered as wedgea, the angle of the wedge being in such cases more or less acute, according to the purpose for which it is intended. In the diagram, A B C is an isosceles wedge introduced into a cleft D E F, power being applied at the point H, in the centre of A B. The resistance on each side and the power may be considered as three forces in equilibrium, and meeting in a point O. The sides of the triangle A B C are severally perpendicular to the directions of the three forces, and therefore, P : H :: AB : AC, or the power is to the total resistance as half the back of the wedge is to the side of the wedge. The mechanical power of the wedge is increased by making the angle of penetration more acute. But no certain theory can be laid down concerning the power of the wedge, since being usually produced by the percussion of a hammer, mallet, &c., every stroke of which causes a tremor in the wedge, the resistance at the sides is for the instant thrown off.
 "Forth goes the woodman . . . to wield the axe
 And drive the wedge, in yonder forest drear."
Cowper: Task, v. 43.

* 2. A mass of metal, especially one in the shape of a wedge.
 "A wedge of gold of fifty shekels weight."
Joshua vii. 21.
 3. Something in the shape of a wedge.
 "The legion when they saw their time, bursting out like a violent wedge, quickly broke and dissipated what opposed them."
Milton: Hist. of Britain, bk. ii.

¶ The thin (or small) end of the wedge: A term used figuratively to express the first move, apparently of little importance, but destined or calculated ultimately to lead to important results.

wedge-bills, s. pl. [SCHISTES.]

wedge-wise, adv. In the manner of a wedge.
 "And thus wedge-wise by little and little they spread broader and broader behind."
P. Holland: Pline, bk. 2., ch. xxiii.

wéde (2), s. [See def.] In Cambridge University a name given to the man who stands last in the list of the classical tripos; said to be taken from the name (Wedgwood) of the man who occupied this place on the first list in 1824. (Also called Wooden-wedge.) [SPOON, s.; ¶ (4).]

wédge, v.t. [WEDGE (1), s.]
 1. To cleave with a wedge or wedges; to rive. (Lit. & fig.)
 "When my heart,
 As wedged with a sigh, would rive in twain."
Shaksp.: Troilus & Cressida, I. 1.
 2. To drive in a wedge; to crowd in; to compress.
 "Wedged in one body like a flight of cranes."
Pope: Homer; Iliad xvii. 624.

* 3. To force, as a wedge forces its way.
 "Part . . . rang'd in figure, wedge their way Intelligent of seasons."
Milton: P. L., vii. 426.
 4. To fasten with a wedge, or with wedges.
 "Wedge on the keenest scythes,
 And give us steeds that snort against the foe."
A. Phillips: Todd.
 5. To fix in the manner of a wedge.
 "They often find great lumps wedged between the rocks as if it naturally grow there."
Dampier: Topoges (an. 1685).

wédg'-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [WEDGE, v.]
A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).
C. As substantive:
Pottery: The process of dividing a lump of clay and dashing the parts together in a direction different from its former contact. It brings the mass to a homogeneous condition, develops plasticity, and expels air-bubbles.

Wédg'-wood, Wédge'-wood, s. [See compounds.]
 * Wedgwood-pyrometer, s.
Physics: A pyrometer in which temperature was ascertained by the contraction of baked clay, measured before and after its subjection to the action of heat. It was not trustworthy, for clay exposed for a long period to a moderate amount of heat will be as much reduced in bulk as by an intensely high temperature continued for a brief period.

Wedgwood-ware, s.
Pottery: A peculiar kind of ware made by Josiah Wedgwood (1730-95), in which artistic designs and treatment were joined to mechanical and technical excellence. Professor Church thus enumerates the several varieties or "bodies of the ware in the order of invention or improvement: 1. Cream-coloured ware, called Queen's ware, in various hues of cream-colour, saffron, and straw. 2. Egyptian black, or basaltic ware, used for scapils, plaques, life-size busts, medallion portraits, &c. 3. Red ware, or Rosso antico, not equal in quality of colour or fineness of grain to the earlier work of John Philip Elers, of Bradwell Wood. 4. White semi-porcelain, or fine stoneware, differing from the white Jasper in its pale straw-coloured or grayish hue, and in its waxlike smooth surface and subtranslucency. 5. Variegated ware, of two kinds, one a cream-coloured body, marbled, mottled, or spangled with divers colours upon the surface and under the glaze; the other an improved kind of agate ware, in which the coloured clays in bands, twists, stripes, and waves constituted the entire substance. 6. Jasper ware, in which the chief triumphs of Wedgwood were wrought, resembling outwardly the finest of his white terra-cotta and semi-porcelain bodies. One of his earliest recipes for this last-named ware was, in percentage, barytes, 57.1; clay, 28.6; flint, 9.5; barium carbonate, 4.8; the novelty of these components being the use of the barytes and barium carbonate. A very little cobalt was occasionally added, even to the white jasper ware, to neutralize the yellowish hue, and by introducing a little Cornish stone or other felspathic material it became less opaque and more wax-like. There are seven colours in this ware besides the white—blue of various shades, lilac, pink, sage-green, olive-green, yellow, and black—and it is remarkable for the absence of bubbles and holes, the flatness of the field, and the uniformity of grain. It was produced in numberless forms—cameos, intaglios, portrait medallions, statuettes, vases, &c., and the yellow variety is rare. Wedgwood's artistic work consists not only in copies of antique gems and in the adaptation of antique designs, but in the original production of many English and foreign draughtsmen and modellers; foremost among the former must be placed the great artist Flaxman. His chief mark is the name "Wedgwood" impressed in Roman characters in the paste before firing, the size of the letters ranging from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ of an inch in height. During his partnership with Bentley the name of this latter was conjoined to his own. In some cases the word "Etruria" is added. The name "Josiah Wedgwood," with a date beneath, belongs to a time when the works at Etruria—now a town of about 5,000 inhabitants—were carried on by the son of the founder; in more recent times the simple name "Wedgwood" has been reverted to. Small marks, chiefly those of workmen, are found on pieces of old Wedgwood ware; Miss Meteyard gives no fewer than one hundred of these, but Wedgwood—like too many other manufacturers, both past and present—suppressed as far as possible such indications of the individuality of his designers.

* wedg'-y, a. [Eng. wedge (1), s.; -y.] Wedge-shaped; like a wedge.
 "Pushed his wedgy snout into the straw subjacent."
—Lander. (Annandale).

wed'-lock, * wed-lok, * wedloke, s. [A.S. wedlak = a pledge, from wed = a pledge, and loc = sport, a gift, in token of pleasure, hence, the gift given to a bride. The reference is to the practice of giving a present to the bride on the morning after marriage; cf. Ger. morgengabe = a nuptial (lit. = morning) gift.]

* 1. Marriage, matrimony.
 "Bowth your necke under the blisful yok . . .
 Which that men clepen spousale or wedlock."

 "Her weddy trophies."
Shakespeare: Hamlet, iv. 7.

2. Abounding with weeds.
 "By weddy pool or pestilential swamp."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vi.

3. Not of good blood or breeding; lank, thin, and long-legged; hence, worthless, as for breeding or racing purposes. (Probably from growing rask like a weed.)

"The bigger Australian youth, say between ten and sixteen years, has a tendency, as I have before hinted, to become long-legged, weedy, and lanky."—Daily Telegraph, Aug. 29, 1883.

weed'-y (2), a. [Eng. weed (2), s.; -y.] Clad in weeds or widow's mourning.

"She was as weedy as in the early days of her mourning."—Debate. (Anecdote.)

weeds, s. pl. [See def.]

Timber Trade: A name given in some parts of the country to what are more commonly termed binders (q.v.). They are called weeds, from weave, because they are used in weaving materials together, especially in crate-making. (Timber Trade Journal.)

week, *weeke, *weke, *wike, *woke, *wouke, *wycke, *wyke, s. [A.S. wice, wicu, wuce, wucu; cogn. with Dut. week; Icel. vika; Sw. vecka; O. H. Ger. wecha, wekha; M. H. Ger. woche; Dan. uge.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The space of seven days; the space from one Sunday, Monday, &c., to another; the most obvious and convenient division of the natural or lunar month. The division of time into weeks was not found among the aborigines of America when the New World was discovered, nor did it exist among the Polynesians, the Japanese, or, it is now believed, the Chinese. It is nearly universal in India, and was found thoroughly rooted when the first Christians went to that country. So has it been from a period of high antiquity in Scandinavia, the names of the several days being connected with identically the same planets in the two regions; so that, if at noon on Sunday in Sweden one could be transported in a moment to India, he would find it Aitwar (= Sunday) there, and so of any other day in the week. The Hebrews, and it is thought the other Semites, had the institution of weeks [II.], the days apparently being simply numbered first, second, third, &c. During the early centuries of their history the Greeks and the Romans had not the institution of weeks, there having been ancient forgery in connection with Homer's oft-quoted passages on the subject. Dion Cassius, in the second century after Christ (Hist., xxviii, 18), considered that the week with the planetary names of the days had been introduced into Rome only recently, and from Egypt. The establishment of Christianity under Constantine confirmed the change, and thence the septenary division of time spread to the whole Christian, and subsequently to the Muhammadan, world. One school of theologians attributes the wide prevalence of septenary institutions to the Sabbath having been divinely instituted at the Creation; in other regards the week as a fourth part of a lunar month.

*2. Applied to the week-days, or working-days, as opposed to Sundays.

"Divide the Sunday from the week."—Shakspeare: Hamlet, l. 1.

II. Script.: In Genesis ii. 2, 3, the reason why the division of time into weeks began is stated to be that God occupied six days in the work of creation, and rested upon the seventh day, which he consequently hallowed. Seven from this time forth constantly occurs, and obviously becomes a sacred number. (Cf. Gen. i. 15, vii. 2, xii. 28, xxix. 18, 20, xxxiii. 3, &c.) Traces of division of time into weeks appear in Gen. vii. 4, viii. 10, 12, &c., till the Sabbath (q.v.) is mentioned by name (Exod. xvi. 23, 26). A week of weeks (= 49 days) was also recognized. [¶ (1).] The first day of the seventh month was a Sabbath (Lev. xxiii. 24), and the whole month was somewhat sacred, being little more than a succession of feasts and Sabbaths (verses 27, 28, 34, 39, &c.). The seventh year was sacred, the very land obtaining Sabbatic rest (Exod. xxiii. II, Lev. xxv. 1-7, Deut. xv. 9, 12); and after seven times seven years came the Jubilee (q.v.) (Lev. xxv. 8-55). Seventy, as having seven for one of its factors, was sacred (Exod. xxiv. I), and seventy weeks constituted a prophetic period. (Dan. ix. 24-27).

¶ 1. Feast of Weeks:

Jewish Antiq.: A name for the Feast of Pentecost (q.v.) (Deut. xvi. 9, 10).

2. Passion-week:

(1) The same as HOLY-WEEK (q.v.).

† (2) Sometimes, and more correctly, applied to the week which begins with the fifth Sunday in Lent, because on that day the more solemn commemoration of the Passion begins.

(3) This (or that) day week: On the same day a week previously or afterwards; or the corresponding day in the preceding or succeeding week.

week-day, s. Any day of the week except the Sunday. (Often used attributively.)

"Taken upon himself to be the week-day preacher."—Thackeray: English Humourist; Swift.

weē-vēr, s. [The same word as VIPER and WYVERN (q.v.).] [QUAVIVER.]

Ichthy.: The popular name of two British fishes: Trachinus draco, the Greater, and T. vipera, the Lesser Weaver. The first, which is the rarer of the two, is from twelve to eighteen inches long, and an excellent food-fish; the second, which is from four to five inches long, is common on the Lincolnshire and Norfolk coasts. These fish have the power of inflicting painful wounds with their dorsal and opercular spines. No special organ for the secretion of poison has been found, but the mucus in the vicinity of the spines has decidedly poisonous properties. The dorsal spines and the spine on the operculum have a deep double groove in which the mucus lodges, and by which it is introduced into punctured wounds.

weē-vil, *we-vel, *wi-ucl, *we-vyl, wy-vel, s. [A.S. wifel, wibil = a kind of beetle; Low Ger. & O. Dut. wevel; O. H. Ger. wibel, wibel; Lith. wabalas.]

Entom.: The popular English name for any beetle of the family Curculionidae, and especially those which force themselves on notice by damage done by their larvae, and sometimes also by themselves, in fields, granaries, &c. Rhynchites betuli, a small blue or green glossy beetle, attacks the vine and the pear-tree; R. alliarie, a still smaller one, attacks the leaves of fruit trees in general; and R. cupreus, the shoots and the fruit of the plum and the apricot. Nematocis oblongus feeds on the young leaves of fruit trees; Hypobius abietis and Pissodes notatus, on the wood of the pine; Calandra granaria, on the grain in granaries; Centorynchus asimitis and C. contractus, on the leaves of turnips, and there are many others. The Nut Weevil is Balaninus nucum; the Rice Weevil, Sitophilus oryze.

weē-villed, a. [Eng. weevil; -ed.] Infested by weevils.

*weē-vil-ly, a. [Eng. weevil; -y.] Infested with weevils; weeviled.

weighing-cage, a. A cage in which live animals may be conveniently weighed, as pigs, sheep, calves, &c.

weighing-house, a. The same as WEIGH-HOUSE (q.v.).

weighing-machine, a. A machine for ascertaining the weight of any object; a common balance, a spring balance, a steelyard, or the like. The term is, however, generally applied to machines which are employed to ascertain the weight of heavy bodies, such as those used for determining the weight of loaded vehicles, machines for weighing cattle, or heavy goods, such as large casks, bales, or the like. Some are constructed on the principle of the lever or steelyard, others on that of a combination of levers, and others on that of the spring balance.

wéight, *wáight (gh silent), wayght, *weght, *weyght, *wight, s. [A.S. gewiht; cogn. with O. Dut. wicht, gewicht; Dut. gewigt; Ger. gewicht; Icel. vætt; Dan. vegt; Sw. vigt.] [WEIGH, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. That property of bodies through which they tend towards the centre of the earth; gravity.

2. The measure of the force of gravity, as determined for any particular body; in a popular sense, the amount which any body weighs; the quantity of matter as estimated by the balance, or expressed numerically with reference to some standard unit.

"The weight of no hair will turn the scales between their avoirdupois."—Shakesp. Henry IV., ii. 4.

3. A piece (usually) of metal of known gravity, and used with scales to determine the gravity of other bodies.

4. A particular scale, system, or mode of ascertaining the relative heaviness of bodies; as, troy wéight, avoirdupois wéight, &c. Weights vary according to the commodity they are intended to weigh. Thus the following are all in use: (1) The grain, computed decimally, for scientific purposes; (2) troy weight; (3) troy ounce, with decimal multiples and divisions, called bullion weight; (4) bankers' weights for sovereigns; (5) apothecaries' weight; (6) Diamond weight and pearl weight, including the carat; (7) Avoirdupois weight; (8) weights for hay and straw; (9) wool-weights, using as factors 2, 3, 7, 13, and their multiples; (10) coal-weights, decimal numbers 1, 5, 2, 1, 05, 025. Besides these the grammes, &c., of French metric system, are used by many scientists. There are also ten different stones. A stone of wool at Darlington is 18 lbs.; a stone of flax at Downpatrick is 24 lbs.; a stone of flax at Belfast is 16½ lbs. and also 24½ lbs. The hundred weight may mean 100 lbs., 112 lbs., or 120 lbs. A pound weight varies in the avoirdupois and the troy.

5. A heavy mass; or something heavy.

"A man leappeth better with weights in his hands than without."—Bacon: Natural History.

6. In clocks, one of two masses of metal which by their weight actuate the machinery.

7. Pressure, burden, load.

"Burdened with like weight of pain."—Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, ii. 1.

8. Importance, consequence, moment, impressiveness.

"Such a point of weight, so near mine honour."—Shakesp.: Henry VIII., iii. 1.

9. Power, influence, importance, consideration.

"If any man of weight, loyal, able, and well formed, would repair to Saint Germain and explain the state of things, his anxiety would easily be convinced."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

II. Technically:

1. Physics: The measure of the force of a body acted on by gravitation; the downward pressure of a body thus acted upon. As it is produced by the influence of gravity on all the particles of the body, it is proportioned to the quantity of matter in the body. Weight obviously exists in solids and liquids; it does so also in gases, though their extreme fluidity and expansibility may seem to suggest the contrary. Weight being produced by the action of gravity, it slightly increases as the body is removed from the equator towards the poles, owing to the flattening of the earth in the latter region; the diminished speed at which the earth rotates in high latitudes has a similar influence; a body also weighs less on a mountain top than on a plain, being at a greater distance from the earth's mass. It is also slightly affected by the temperature of the air and its barometric pressure. [DENSITY, GRAVITY.]

2. Mech.: The resistance which in a machine has to be overcome by the power; in the simpler mechanical powers, as the lever, wheel and axle, pulley, and the like, usually the heavy body that is set in motion or held in equilibrium by the power.

3. Pathol.: A sensation of heaviness or pressure over the whole body, or any portion of it: as, a weight on the stomach. In the case of the organ just mentioned, this generally arises from undigested food.

¶ Dead weight: A heavy, oppressive, or greatly impeding burden.

weight-carrier, s. A horse stont and strong enough to carry a heavy rider.

"Fifteen weight-carriers, including Bedskin."—Pied, March 29, 1866.

weight-nail, s.

Naut.: A nail heavier than a deck-nail, and used for fastening buttons, cleats, &c.

weight-rest, s.

Lathe: A rest which is held steadily upon the shears by a weight suspended beneath.

weight-thermometer, s.

Instruments: A glass cylinder to which is joined a bent capillary glass tube, open at the end. It is weighed first empty, and then when filled with mercury, the subtraction of the smaller from the larger number gives the weight of the mercury. It is then raised to a known temperature, when a certain quantity of the expanding mercury passes out. From this the temperature can be deduced.

wéight (gh silent), v.t. [WEIGHT, s.] To add or attach a weight or weights to; to load with additional weight; to cause to carry additional weight; to add to the heaviness of.

"Dark arts are in certain quarters practiced to a lamentable extent in disguising and weighting tea."—Daily Telegraph, June 24, 1858.

wéight-éd (gh silent), pa. par. or a. [WEIGHT, v.] weighted-lathe, s. A lathe in which the rest is held down firmly on the shears by a suspended weight.

wéight-í-ly, (gh silent), adv. [Eng. weighty; -ly.]

1. In a weighty manner; heavily, ponderously.

2. With force, influence, or impressiveness; with moral power or force; seriously, impressively.

"Is his poetry the worse, because he makes his agents speak weightily and sententiously?"—Broomer: On the Odyssey.

wéight-í-néss (gh silent), s. [Eng. weighty; -ness.]

1. The quality or state of being weighty; heaviness, gravity, ponderosity, weight.

"The cave in which these bears lay sleeping sound. Was hut of earth, and with her weightiness Upon them fell."—Spenser: Ruines of Time.

2. Solidity, force, impressiveness; power of convincing; as, the weightiness of an argument.

3. Importance.

"Before a due examination be made proportionable to the weightiness of the matter."—Locke: On Human Understanding, bk. ii., ch. xxi.

wéight-íng (gh silent), s. [Eng. weight; -ing.]

Found.: The act of holding down the flasks in which the mould has been made so as to resist the upward pressure of the metal.

wéight-léss (gh silent), a. [Eng. weight; -less.]

1. Having no weight; light, inponderable.

"Light and weightless down Perforce must move."—Shakesp.: 2 Henry IV., iv. 4.

2. Of no importance or consideration.

"And so [they] are oft-times emboldened to come upon them as from aloft very weak and weightless disconcerts."—Bp. Hall: A pol. against Brownists, § 1.

wéight-mént (gh silent), s. [Eng. weight; -ment.] The act of weighing.

"Accepted after full examination, approval, and weightment by the respondents."—Times, April 8, 1894.

wéight-ý, *wáight-ý (gh silent), wayght-y, a. [Eng. weight, s.; -y.]

1. Having or being of great weight; heavy ponderous.

"It is too weighty for your grace to wear."—Shakesp.: Richard III., iii. 1.

2. Important, serious, momentous; of great importance.

"Will you go To give your censures in this weighty business."—Shakesp.: Richard III., ii. 2.

3. Calculated or adapted to turn the scale in the mind; convincing, cogent, forcible.

"My reasons are both good and weighty."—Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, i. 1.

4. Burdensome; hard to bear.

"The cares of empire are great, and the burthen, which lies upon the shoulders of princes, very weighty."—Atterbury: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 8.

*5. Grave or serious in aspect.

*6. Entitled to authority on account of experience, ability, or character.

*7. Rigorous, severe.

"If, after two days' shine, Athens contains thee Attend our weightier judgment."—Shakesp.: Timon, iii. 4.

wéil, wíel, s. [A.S. wæl; O. Dut. wael.] A small whirlpool. (Scotch.)

"Claymores o' the Hielanders, and the deep waters and wells o' the Avondow."—Scott: Rob Roy, ch. xxiv.

weim-mán-né-ss (w as v), s. pl. [Mod. Lat. weimmann(ia); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eae.]

Bot.: A tribe of Cunoniaceæ (q.v.).

weim-mán-ní-a (w as v), s. [Named after John Wm. Weinmann, a Ratisbon apothecary and botanist, who about 1750 published his Phytanthoza Iconographica.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Weinmannææ (q.v.). Evergreen shrubs or trees, with reticulated petioles, compound or simple leaves, calyx four-parted, petals four, stamens eight, an hypogynous disk, fruit a many-seeded capsule. About forty species are known, from South America, South Africa, Madagascar, New Zealand, &c. The bark is astringent; that of one species is used in Peru for tanning leather, and for adulterating Peruvian bark (q.v.), and that of W. tinctoria is employed in Bourbon for dyeing red.

wéir, *wear, *wer, s. [A.S. wer = a weir, a dam; lit. = a defence, and allied to werian = to defend, to protect; Icel. vör = a fenced-in landing-place; ver = a fishing-station; Ger. wehr = a defence; wehren = to defend; mühlwehr = a mill-dam.]

1. A dam across a stream to raise the level of the water above it. The water may be conducted to a mill, a sluice, or a fish-trap.

"A pleasant rimour rutes the ear, Like water rushing through a weir."—Longfellow: Tales of a Wayside Inn. (Prelude.)

2. A fence or enclosure of stakes, twigs, or nets, set in a stream, or in a bay or inlet of the sea, to catch fish.

wéird, *wierd, *wirde, *wyrde, s. & a. [A.S. wyrd, wurd, wurd = fate, destiny; cogn. with Icel. wíðr = fate; M. H. Ger. wurth = fate, death, from the same root as A.S. weord-han; Icel. verða and Ger. werden = to become.]

A. As substantive:

1. Fate, destiny; formerly, one of the Norns or Fates.

"And this weird shall overtake thee."—Scott: Bridal of Triermain, ii. 24.

B. As adjective:

1. Pertaining to or connected with fate or destiny; influencing or able to influence fate.

2. Relating to or partaking of the nature of witchcraft; supernatural, unearthly, wild; suggestive of unearthliness.

"Those sweet, low tones, that seemed like a weird incantation."—Longfellow: Evangeline, ii. 4.

wéird-néss, s. [Eng. weird; -ness.] The quality or state of being weird; unearthliness, eeriness.

"Mingling in faintest fashion the weirdness of fairy lore with what Parisians call the latest 'cry of actuality.'"—Daily Chronicle, Feb. 22, 1888.

wéise, wéize, v.t. [Icel. vísa; Dan. vise; Ger. weisen = to show, to point out, to indicate.] To direct, to guide, to turn, to incline. (Scotch.) wē-ism, s. [Eng. we; -ism.] The excessive or too frequent use of the pronoun we; wegotism.

weiss-ī-a (w as v), s. [Named after F. W. Weiss, a German botanist.] Bot.: The typical genus of Weissiel (q.v.).

weiss-ī-ō-ī (w as v), s. pl. [Mod. Lat. weiss-ī(o)-i; Lat. masc. pl. adj. suff. -ei.] Bot.: An order or a tribe of Pleurocarpous Mosses, having leaves of close texture, an erect equal capsule, a peristome either absent or with sixteen teeth, and a dimidiate veil. Several species are found in Britain. (Berkeley.)

weiss-ig-ite (w as v), s. [After Weissig, near Dresden, where found; suff. -ite (Min).] Min.: A variety of orthoclase felspar occurring in very small whitish twinned crystals in cavities of an amygdaloidal rock.

weiss-ite (w as v), s. [After the crystallographer, Prof. Weiss, of Berlin; suff. -ite (Min).] Min.: An altered form of folite (q.v.), resembling fahlunite in most of its characters, and included by Dana under that species.

*weive (1), v.t. & i. [WAIVE.]

*weive (2), v.t. [WEAVE.]

wēize, v.t. [WHIZ.] To drive with force. (Scott.)

*weke, a. [WEAK.]

*weke, s. [WEEK.]

*wel, adv. [WELL.]

wēl-a-wāy, *weal-a-way, interj. [A.S. wā ñi wā = woe ! lo ! woe !] An exclamation of sorrow, grief, or despair; alas! Often corrupted into wellyday.

"Alas! Constance, thou art no champion, No fight canst thou nat, so wondrous!" Chaucer: C. T., 5, 682.

Wēlch, a. & s. [WELSH, G.]

wēlch-ēr, s. [WELSER, G.]

Wēlch-man, s. [WELSHMAN.]

wēl-cōme, *wel-com, *wil-kome, s., a., & interj. [A.S. wīlcōma = one who comes so as to please another, from wīl, pref., allied to wīlla = will, pleasure, and cōma = a comer, from cuman = to come; cogn. with Ger. wīlkommen = welcome: O. H. Ger. wīllcōmo, from wīllfo = will, pleasure, and kōmen (Ger. kommen) = to come. The change in meaning was due to Icel. wēlkomin = welcome, from wēl = well, and kōminn, ps. par. of kōma = to come; Dan. wēlkommen = welcome; Sw. wēlkommen. (Skeat.)]

A. As substantive:

1. A salutation of a new-comer.

"Their shout of welcome, shrill and wide, Shook the steep mountain's steady side." Scott: Lady of the Lake, III. 41.

2. A kind reception of a guest or new-comer.

"Who'er has travelled life's dull round, Where'er his stages may have been, May sigh to think he still has found His warmest welcome at an inn." Shantons: Lines Written on Window of an Inn.

B. As adjective:

1. Received with pleasure or gladness; admitted willingly to one's house, entertainment, or company.

"When the glad soul is made Heaven's welcome guest." Cooper: Progress of Error, 165.

2. Producing gladness or pleasure; pleasing, grateful.

3. A term of courtesy implying readiness to serve another, the granting of a liberty, freedom to have and enjoy, and the like.

"Lord Helicane, a word."

"With me? and welcome!" Shakespeare: Pericles, II. 4.

C. As interj.: A word used in welcoming or saluting a new-comer.

"I waded his huntsman's cap on high, Cried, 'Welcome, welcome, noble lord!'" Scott: The Chase, vii.

¶ Welcome to our House: Bot.: Euphorbia Cyparissias.

wēl-cōme, v.t. [WELCOME, S.]

1. To salute, as a new-comer, with kindness; to receive with kindness or hospitality.

"I was aboard twice or thrice, and very kindly wel comed." Dampier: Voyages, (an. 1682).

2. To receive with pleasure; to be pleased with.

"A brow unbenet that seemed to welcome woe." Shakspeare: Rape of Lucrece, 1, 509.

wēl-cōme-ness, *wel-com-ness, s. [Eng. welcome; -ness.] The quality or state of being welcome; agreeableness, gratefulness.

"Yet will they really still continue new, not only upon the scores of their welcome, but by their perpetually equal, because infinite, distance from a period." Bayle: Works, I. 201.

wēl-cōm-ēr, s. [Eng. welcome(-); -er.] One who welcomes; one who bids welcome; one who receives with kindness or pleasure.

"Farewell, thou woful welcome of glory." Shakspeare: Richard III., IV. 1.

wēld (1), *welde, *wold, *wolde, s. (Skeat believes it an English word, perhaps from well, s., because it is boiled for dyeing. Scotch wald; Ger. wau; Dan. & Sw. wau; Dut. wouw; Fr. guado; Ital. guado; Port. gualde, gauda; Sp. gualda. Mahn identifies it with woad, from which, however, it is distinct.)

Bot.: Reseda Luteola. It is a branched Mignonette, two or three feet high, with linear, lanceolate, undivided leaves, long spike-like racemes of flowers, three to five yellow petals, four sepals, and three stigmas. It is wild in waste places in England in clay or chalk soils, is common in Ireland, but doubtfully indigenous in Scotland. It occurs also in Europe, western Asia and northern Africa, and has been introduced into the United States. It yields a yellow dye. A paint is also made from it called Dutch pink. Dyers' greening weld is Genista tinctoria. [DYER'S-WEED, 2; RESEDA.]

wēld (2), s. [WELD, v.] The junction of metals by heating and hammering the parts. It differs from soldering and brazing in that no more fusible metal is made to form a bond of union between the parts. The partial fusion of the parts may be assisted by a flux, borax for instance. Great pressure may make a perfect weld without applied heat. It is probable that heat is developed at the point of junction.

wēld (2), v.t. [Prop. well, the d being excessive, the word being a particular use of the verb well = (1) to boil up, (2) to spring up as a fountain, (3) to heat to a high degree, (4) to beat heated iron; cf. Sw. wälla (lit. = to well) = to weld; Dut. wellen = to boil, to unite, to weld.]

1. Lit.: To unite or join together, as two pieces of metal, by hammering or compressing them after they have been raised to a great heat. The pressure is applicable to but few of the metals, iron fortunately being pre-eminent among these. Platinum also possesses this property, which is utilized in forming the granules in which it is received from its sources of production into masses of sufficient size to be practically useful in the arts. Horn, tortoiseshell, and a few other substances may also be joined by welding.

2. Fig.: To unite very closely.

"To weld the three kingdoms into an inseparable union of sentiment and heart, as well as of interest." Weekly Echo, Sept. 5, 1885.

wēld-a-ble, a. [Eng. weld (2), v.; -able.] Capable of being welded.

"Steel, like wrought iron, possesses the important quality of being weldable." Cassell's Technical Educator, II. xii., p. 255.

wēld-ōd, pa. par. or a. [WELD (2), v.]

welded-tube, s. A gas or water-pipe made of a skelp bent to a circular form, raised to a welding-heat in an appropriate furnace, and as it leaves, almost at a point of fusion, it is dragged by the chain of a draw-bench through a pair of bell-mouthed jaws. These jaws opened at the moment of introducing the end of the skelp, which is welded without the agency of a mandrel.

*wēld-ēr (1), s. [Eng. weld (1), v.; -er.] In Ireland, a manager; an actual occupant; a tenant of land under a middleman or series of middlemen.

"Such immediate tenants have others under them, and so a third and fourth in subordination, till it comes to the wēlder, as they call him, who sits at a rackrent, and lives miserably." Swift: Against the Power of Bishops.

wēld-ēr (2), s. [Eng. weld (2), v.; -er.] One who welds.

wēld-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [WELD (2), v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The process of uniting two pieces of a fusible material together by hammering or by compression while softened by heat.

welding-heat, s. The heat necessary for welding two pieces of metal; specifically, the white heat to which iron bars are brought when about to undergo this process.

welding-machine, s. A machine for uniting the edges of plates previously bent, so as to lap within a chamber when they are exposed to a gas-flame, and from which they pass to the rolls or hammer which completes the joint.

welding-swage, s. A block or fulling-tool for assisting the closure of a welded joint.

wēld-wōrt, s. [Eng. weld (1), and wort.]

Bot. (Pl.): The order Resedaceæ (q.v.). Called also in English Resedade. (Lindley.)

*wēld-y, a. [Eng. weld (1), v.; -y.] Wieldy, active.

*wēld-yng, s. [WELD (1), v.] Power, governance, direction.

"Ye have them in yours might and in yours weld-yng." Chaucer: Tale of Melibeus.

*wele, adv. [WELL, adv.]

*wele, s. [WEAL.]

*wele-ful, a. [WEALFUL.]

*wele-ful-ness, s. [Mid. Eng. weleful; -ness.] Happiness, prosperity, good fortune.

*welew, v.i. [Prob. the same word as welk (q.v.).] To fade, to wither.

"Whanne the smooe roos up it welende for hets, and it driede up." Wycliffe: Mark iv.

wēl-fāre, s. [Eng. well, adv., and fare.] The state of faring well; a state of exemption from misfortune, trouble, calamity, or evil; the enjoyment of health and prosperity; well being, success, prosperity.

"We have been praying for our husbands' wēl-fāre." Shakspeare: Merchant of Venice, v.

*wel-ful, a. [WEALFUL.]

*wēlk, *wēlke, v.t. & i. [Dut. & Ger. welken = to wither, to fade; from welk = dry, lean.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To fade, to wither.

2. To decline, to set, to fall, to wane.

"When ruddy Phoebus gins to welke in west." Spenser: F. Q., I. 1.

B. Transitive:

1. To fade, to wither.

2. To contract, to shorten.

"Now sad Winter welked bath the day." Spenser: Shepheard's Calendar; November.

*welk, s. [WELK.]

*wēlkd (1), a. [WELK, v.] Faded, declined, waned, set.

"By that the welked Phoebus gan avalle His wearie waine." Spenser: Shepheard's Calendar; Jan.

wēlkd (2), a. [WHELKED.]

wēl-kīn, *wel-ken, *wel-kine, *wel-kne, *wel-kene, *welcone, *welcne, *wolkne, s. & a. [A.S. wōlcun = clouds; pl. of wōlcen = a cloud; O. Sax. wolkun; O. H. Ger. wolchan; Ger. wolke. Origin doubtful, perhaps from wolkun = to roll, to walk.]

A. As subst.: The sky; the vault of heaven (Now only used in poetry.)

"Black stormy clouds deform'd the welkin's face, And from beneath was heard a wailing sound." Thomson: Castle of Indolence, II. 44.

*B. As adj.: Sky-blue.

"Look on me with your welkin eye." Shakspeare: Winter's Tale, I. 2.

wēll, *wel, *wolle, s. [A.S. wella, well, wylle, wylle, wylt, from weallan (pa. t. weol, pa. par. weallen) = to well up, to boil; cogn. with Icel. well = ebullition, from wella = to well, to boil (pa. t. walla); Dut. well = a spring, Dan. wellen = a spring; Ger. wellen = a wave, from wullen = to undulate, to boil, to bubble up.]

I. Ordinary Language:1. Literally:

(1) A spring, a fountain; water issuing from the earth.

"Of wells wrote and sold ymo."
Robert of Gloucester, p. 1.

(2) An artificial structure from which a supply of water is obtained for domestic or other purposes; a shaft dug or bored in the ground to obtain water, and walled or lined with bricks, &c., to prevent the caving in of the sides.

"The book of Genesis (the most venerable monument of antiquity, considered merely with a view to history), will furnish us with frequent instances of violent contentions concerning wells; the exclusive property of which appears to have been established in the first digger or occupant, even in such places where the ground and herbage remained yet in common."—Blackstone: Comment, bk. ii, ch. l.

(3) A similar structure or shaft sunk into the earth to procure oil, brine, &c.

2. Figuratively:

(1) A spring, a source, an origin.

"Crist, that of perfection is wells."
Chaucer: C. T., 4, 890.

(2) The space in a law-court, immediately in front of the judges' bench, occupied by counsel, &c.

(3) The hollow part between the seats of a jaunting-car, used for holding luggage, &c.

(4) (See extract.)

"A well, in the language of those seas, denotes one of the whirlpools, or circular eddies, which wheel and boil with astonishing strength, and are very dangerous."—Scott: Pirata, ch. xxxviii. (Note.)

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: The space in a building in which winding-stairs are placed, usually lighted from the roof; sometimes limited to the open space in the middle of a winding-staircase, or to the opening in the middle of a staircase built round a hollow newel. Called also a Well-hole and Well-staircase.

2. Mil. mining: An excavation in the earth, with branches or galleries running out of it.

3. Mining: The lower part of a furnace into which the water falls.

4. Nautical:

(1) A partition to enclose the pumps from the bottom to the lower decks, to render them accessible, and prevent their being damaged.

(2) A compartment in a fishing-vessel, formed by bulkheads properly strengthened and lightened off, having the bottom perforated with holes, to give free admission to the water, so that fish may be kept alive therein.

¶ (1) Artesian well: [ARTESIAN-WELL].

(2) Dark well: [DARK-WELL].

(3) Mineral well: A well containing mineral waters. [MINERAL-WATERS.]

well-boat, s. A fishing-boat having a well in it to convey fish alive to market. [WELL, s., B. 4 (2).]

well-borer, s. One who or that which digs or bores for water; a well-digger or maker.

well-bucket, s. A vessel used for drawing water from a well.

well-deck, s.

Neut.: An open space in a ship between the fore-castle and poop. (Used also adjectively.)

"The objection to the well-deck ship is not due to structural form, but to the simple point whether, if a sea should flood the hollow between her fore-castle and her poop, her capacity of buoyancy is equal to the support of this additional load of tons upon tons weight of water."—Daily Telegraph, March 22, 1888.

well-drain, s.

1. A drain or vent for water, somewhat like a pit or well, serving to discharge the water of wet land.

2. A drain leading to a well.

well-drain, v.t. To drain, as land, by means of wells or pits, which receive the water, and from which it is discharged by means of machinery.

well-dressing, s.

Anthrop.: An old custom observed at Tisington, in Derbyshire, of dressing the wells and springs with flowers on Ascension Day. After morning prayer, a procession is formed, headed by the clergymen, and the wells are visited and prayers offered and hymns sung at each well. The custom is said to commemorate a fearful drought which visited Derbyshire in the summer of 1615, during which time the wells of Tisington flowed as usual. More probably it is a survival of water-worship (q.v.).

"In consequence of its questionable origin, whether Pagan or Popish, we have heard some good but strait-laced people condemn the well-dressing greatly."—Chambers: Book of Days, l. 507.

well-flowering, s.

Anthrop.: Well-dressing (q.v.).

"The pure sparkling water... makes this feast of the well-flowering one of the most beautiful of all the old customs that are left in 'merris England.'"—Chambers: Book of Days, l. 509.

well-grass, † well-kerse, s.

Bot.: Nasturtium officinale. (Scotch.)

well-head, s. The source, head, or origin of a river, &c.; a spring of water.

"Up to the saddle-girths in a well-head, as the springs are called."—Scott: Old Mortality, ch. xv.

well-hole, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: A cavity which receives a counterbalancing weight in some mechanical contrivances.

2. Arch.: The same as WELL, s., II. 1.

* well-kerse, s. [WELL-GRASS.]

well-packing, s. A bag of flaxseed—known as a seedbag—or some other material placed around a well-tube in an oil-well to isolate the oil-bearing strata from water above or below.

well-room, s.

1. A room built over a spring, or to which its waters are conducted, and where they are drunk.

2. A place in the bottom of a boat where the water is collected, and where it is thrown out with a scoop.

well-sinker, s. One who digs or sinks wells.

well-sinking, s. The operation of sinking or digging wells; the act or process of boring for water.

* well-spring, s. A source of continual supply.

"Understanding is a well-spring unto him that hath it."—Proverbs xvi. 22.

well-staircase, s. [WELL, s., II. 1.]

well-sweep, s. A sweep or swipe for a well.

well-trap, s. A stink-trap.

well-tube point, s. An auger or spear-point at the bottom end of a perforated tube for a driven well.

well-water, s. The water which flows into a well from subterraneous springs; water drawn from a well.

* wēll, welle, v.t. & t. [A.S. wellan, wyllan.] [WELL, s.]

A. Intrans.: To spring; to issue forth, as water from the earth or a spring; to flow.

"Blood that welled from out the wound."
Dryden: Virgil; Æneid x. 1, 184.

B. Trans.: To pass forth, as from a well.

"To her people wealth they forth do well.
And health to every foreign nation."
Spenser: F. Q., II. x. 28.

wēll, wel, adv. & a. [A.S. wel, well; cogn. with Dut. wel; Icel. wel, val; Dan. wel; Sw. väl; Goth. waila; O. H. Ger. wela, wola; Ger. wohl, wol. From the same root as Lat. volo = to wish; Gr. βούλωμαι (boulomai) = to wish; Sansc. vara = better; vara = a wish; eri = to choose; Eng. will, weal, and wealth.]

A. As adverb:

1. In a proper or right manner; justly; not ill or wickedly.

1. An old genus of Abietae, founded by Lindley for the reception of Wellingtonia gigantea, the great tree of California. Some United States botanists, thinking that so splendid a tree, growing in the Western Continent, should be dedicated to the memory of an American rather than of a British hero, altered the name to Washingtonia. It is now, however, considered to be identical with Sequoia (q.v.). [MAMMOTH-TREE.]

2. A synonym of Meliosma (q.v.).

wēll-nōss, s. [Eng. well, a.; -ness.] The state of being well or in good health. (Hood.)

wēl-witsch-ī-a (or w as v), s. [Named from its discoverer, Dr. Welwitsch an African explorer, who died in 1872.]

Bot.: A genus of Guetaceae, with but one known species, Welwitschia mirabilis. It rises from the sand in which it grows, putting forth two cotyledonary leaves, which ultimately become about six feet long, or rather more, coriaceous and ragged. No other leaves follow, but the connecting stem increases horizontally both above and below the insertion of the leaves, which it clasps in a marginal slit or cavity. From the upper side of the stem at the base of the leaves there are annually developed several dichotomous stems six inches to a foot high, articulated, and with two small opposita scales at each joint, the several branches terminated by oblong cones. These contain two kinds of flowers: one hermaphrodite and the other female, with naked ovules. To a certain extent the plant connects Gymnosperms with Angiosperms. It grows in sandy deserts in Africa between 14-23° S., and attains a great age, some specimens being estimated as at least one hundred years old.

WELWITSCHIA MIRABILIS.

Wën-löck, s. [See def.]
Geog.: A parliamentary and municipal borough in Shropshire.

Wenlock formation or group, a.

Geol.: A formation of Upper Silurian age, immediately succeeding the Llandovery-formation, and having above it the Ludlow-formation. If the Llandovery beds, which are of a transition character, be made to constitute the base of the Upper Silurian, then the Wenlock-formation is its centre. It is well developed in the vicinity of Wenlock, and is considered to be above four thousand feet in thickness. There are two divisions: (1) the more ancient, the Woolhope-limestone and Shale, the Tarannon-shale, and the Denbighshire Grits; (2) the Wenlock-limestone and Shale. The Woolhope Limestone and Shale occur at Woolhope, Malvern, &c. [WOOLHOPE.] Their thickness is 150 feet. [For Tarannon Shales, see TARANNON.] The Denbighshire Grits constitute mountain ranges there and in South Wales, and on decomposing form a sterile soil. The Wenlock-shale is often soft, so as to constitute a kind of mudstone rich in crinoids, corals, brachiopods, &c. It is about 1,400 feet thick. The Wenlock, or Dudley, Limestone is about 150 feet thick. It forms a continuous ridge in Shropshire for about twenty miles from south-west to north-east, with corals, acrinities, and trilobites. [DUDLEY.] It is of a concretionary nature, some of the concretions, locally termed ballstones, being eighty feet in diameter. The whole Wenlock fauna consists of 171 genera and 530 species. Of these there are 76 species of Actinozoa, 68 of Echinodermata, 78 of Crustacea, 101 of Brachiopoda, 44 of Lamelli-branchiata, and 169 of other classes. The Wenlock-formation is represented abroad at Niagara, &c.

wënt, pret. & old pa. par. of v. [WEND, v.]

A. As pret.: The past tense of wend, and now used as the past tense of go.
"Sunk was his heart; his colour went and came."
Pope: Homer; Iliad xxiv. 443.

* B. As pa. par. of wënd: [WEND, v.]

* wënt, s. [WEND.] A way, a passage; a turning backwards and forwards.

"Farre under ground from that of living went . . . Their dreadful dwelling is."
Spenser: F. Q., IV. ii. 47.

wën-tle-träp, s. [Ger. wendeltreppe = winding stairs, from the shape of the species.]

Zool.: A popular name for the genus Scalaria (q.v.). Those in which the whorls are close are called by collectors False Wentletraps; those in which they are contiguous are known as True Wentletraps. Of the former, some are found in northern seas, and one, Scalaria communis, occurs on the British coast; the latter are all natives of warm sea. One, the Precious Wentletrap (S. pretiosa), from the south-east of Asia, was formerly in such esteem that a very fine specimen is said to have sold for 200 guineas, though good shells may now be bought for a few shillings. It is about two inches long, snow-white or pale flesh-coloured, with eight separated whorls.

* wëre-gëld, * wëre-gild, * wër-gild, * wëhr-gëld, s. [A.S. wergild, from wer = a man, and gild, geld = payment, compensation . . . a guld.]

Anglo-Saxon Law: A kind of fine for manslaughter and other offences against the person, on payment of which the offender was cleared from any further liability or punishment. The fine or compensation due from the offender varied in amount according to his rank and station and that of the person killed or injured, and also according to the nature of the injury. It was in general paid to the relatives of the person killed, or, in the case of a wound or other bodily harm, to the person injured; but, if the cause was brought before the community, the plaintiff only received part of the fine, the community, or the king, when there was one, receiving the other half.

"The Roman 'conviva Regis' . . . was estimated in his wërgild at half the price of the Barbarian Anstron, the highest known class at the Merovingian court, and above the common alodial proprietor."—Hallam: Mediaeval Ages.

* weren, v.i. [WERE, v.] wëre-na, v.i. [See def.] Were not. (Scotch.)

"I trow, giti ye were na blinded w' the graces and favours, and services and enjoyments, and employments and inheritances of this wicked world."—Scott: Waverley, ch. xxxvi.

wëre-wëlf, * wer-wolf, s. [A.S. werewulf, from wer = a man, and wulf = a wolf; cogn. with Ger. wälf; M. H. Ger. werwolf.]

Anthrop.: A person supposed to have the power of transforming himself at certain seasons into a wolf, and assuming all the ferocity of that animal, joined to the practice of disinterring and feeding on dead bodies. [LYCANTHROPIA, LYCANTHROPHY.] In Bulgaria the legends of werewolves are inextricably mixed up with those of the vampires [VAMPIRE, A. I. 1.], and the same sign—the meeting of the eyebrows, as if the soul were about to take flight to enter some other body—is held to be conclusive evidence that a person belongs to one of these classes.

"The Budas of Abyssinia . . . are at once the smiths and potters, sorcerers and sorceresses of their district."—Taylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), i. 113.

† wëre-wölf-îsm, s. [Eng. werewolf; -ism.] Lycanthropy (q.v.).

"Traditional belief in were-wölf-îsm must, however, have remained long in the popular mind."—S. E. Gould: Were-wolves, ch. viii.

wer-ish, a. [WEARISH.]

* wërke, s. & v. [WORK, s. & v.]

* werne, v.l. [WARN.]

Wër-nër-i-an, a. [See def.] Of or belonging to Abraham Gottlob Werner, one of the founders of geological science. He was born on Sept. 25, 1750, at Wesslau on the Queiss, in Upper Lusatiz, where his father was superintendent of a foundry. In 1774 Werner published a little work which revolutionised the science of mineralogy and led to his being appointed in 1775 Professor of Mineralogy in the School of Mines at Freiberg. He introduced the geological use of the word "formation," and taught that the exterior of the earth consists of a series of such formations arranged in d-terministe order. He was the author of the Neptunian Theory or Hypothesis (q.v.). He died on June 30, 1817.

wēr-nēr-ite, s. [After the celebrated mineralogist A. G. Werner; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A name originally given by d'Andrada to some minerals from Norway which subsequently were found to vary in chemical composition, and are now known as the scapolites, wernerite being retained for the name of a member of the group. Crystallization, tetragonal; hardness, 5 to 6; sp. gr., 2.63 to 2.9; lustre, vitreous when pure, otherwise pearly to resinous; fracture sub-conchoidal. Compos. owing to its liability to alteration, somewhat variable, the mean being: silica, 48.4; alumina, 28.5; lime, 18.1; soda, 5.0 = 100, with the formula $\frac{1}{2}(\text{CaO} \cdot \text{Na}_2\text{O}) + \frac{1}{2}\text{Al}_2\text{O}_3 + 3\text{SiO}_2 + \text{SiO}_2$. Dana includes in this species Nuttallite, Chelmsfordite, and Glaucolite, and as altered forms, Atheriasite, Stroganovite, Algerite, Wilsonite, Terenite, Micarille, and Gabronite (see these words).

* werre, s. [WAR, s.]

2. Delicate; having a pale and sickly look. (Scotch.)

* wērst, *wērste, a. [WORST, a.]

wért, v.t. [See def.] The second person singular of wære. [WERE (1), v.]

wérth'-e-man-ite (werth as vért), s. [After A. Wertheman; -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A massive mineral related to aluminite (q.v.); sp. gr., 2.80; colour white. Compos.: a hydrated sulphate of alumina, s.g., sulphuric acid, 34.50; alumina, 45.0; sesquioxide of iron, 19.25; water, 19.25 = 100, which gives the formula $\text{Al}_2\text{SO}_8 + 8\text{aq.}$: this differs from aluminite in containing less water. Found in a bed of clay near Chacaboyas, Peru.

* wertherian (as wër-tër-ÿ-an), a. [After the hero of Goethe's Sorrows of Werter.] Sentimental, dambypamby.

Westminster Assembly, s.

Hist.: An assembly of divines, lay assessors, &c., which met in obedience to an ordinance of the Lords and Commons, issued June 12, 1643—

"For the calling of an assembly of learned and godly divines to be consulted with by the Parliament for the settling of the government and liturgy of the Church of England, and for vindicating and clearing of the doctrine of the said Church from false assertions and interpretations."

A hundred and twenty clergymen, with ten lords and twenty commoners, or lay assessors, were nominated to carry out the ordinance. The meeting was forbidden by the king on June 22, but no notice was taken of the prohibition. On July 1 sixty-nine of the nominated members attended in Henry VII.'s Chapel in Westminster Abbey, and the assembly began. They sat 1,163 times, their last meeting being on Feb. 22, 1649. On Sept. 15, 1643, commissioners arrived from the Church of Scotland to aid in the deliberations. On April 20, 1643, the Assembly submitted to Parliament a Directory for Public Worship; between Oct. 1 and Nov. 26, 1644, the Confession of Faith, in two portions [Confession, III. 4 (2)]; on Nov. 5, 1647, the Shorter Catechism (q.v.); and on Sept. 15, 1648, the Longer Catechism. The great majority of the members were Presbyterians, a small but active body were Independents, and a yet smaller one, but containing able men, were Erastians. The Parliament itself was Erastian, and, though accepting and ratifying the productions of the Assembly, did not allow the spiritual independence which the majority of its members earnestly desired to obtain. [PRESBYTERIAN.] (English.)

"But sax Scotch miles thou try't their mettle, An' gart them whâize."

Burns: Auld Farmer to His Auld Mare.

whâle, whal, qual, s. [A.S. hwæl; cogn. with Dut. walvisch = whale-fish; Icel. hvârl; Dan. & Sw. hval; Ger. wal, walffisch.]

1. Zool.: The popular name of any species or individual of the modern order Cetacea (the Cetacea Ordinaria of older writers) [CETACEA.] The head is generally larger, and in some species constitutes more than one-third of the entire length; mouth always wide, with stiff immobile lips; fore limbs reduced to flattened fin-like paddles; no external traces of hind limbs, though sometimes the vestige of a femur is present in the shape of a nodule of bone about the size of a walnut. Immediately below the skin is a thick layer of fat, held together by fibrous tissue, constituting the blubber [BLUBBER, s., 2.]; and in nearly all there is a dorsal fin. The eye is small; there is no external ear, but a minute auditory aperture, and the nostrils, which are usually called "blowholes," are situated on the top of the head, except in the Sperm Whale, which has them at the extremity of the snout. Whales are found in all seas, and some, like the Beluga (q.v.), ascend large rivers. All pass their lives in water, and are absolutely helpless on land. They rise frequently to the surface to breathe, and usually expose the highest part of the head where the nostrils are situated. The so-called "spouting" of the whale is only the ordinary act of breathing. When the animal rises to the surface it forcibly expels from the lungs the air taken in at the last previous inspiration, which is of course heated and loaded with watery vapour. As this rapidly condenses when expelled, it forms a column of spray, which has been erroneously assumed to be water taken in by the mouth and ejected by the nostrils. In hunting the whale the harpoon may pierce the lungs or air-passages, and then a column of blood may be forced high in the air through the nostrils, but—making due allowance for the different methods of breathing—similar result follows wounds in the respiratory organs of other mammals. All the Cetacea prey on living food of some kind—chiefly fish, small floating crustacea, pteropods, and squids. The genus Orca alone attacks and devours other warm-blooded animals, such as seals and individuals of its own order. Whales are for the most part timid, inoffensive animals, active and affectionate, especially the cows towards their calves, of which they produce but one, or rarely two, at a time. They generally swim in herds, or "schools," though some species have been met with singly or in pairs. In size they differ greatly: some of the Delphinidae are only about four feet in length, while the gigantic Sperm-whale, or Cæchilot (q.v.), reaches some fifty feet, which appears to be never greatly exceeded in this species, though stories are told of animals nearly double as long, and Balenoptera sibbaldii, probably the largest living whale, attains the length of eighty feet. Popularly the name is used in a more restricted sense than that in which it is employed scientifically. The members of the Platanistidae and Delphinidae are called Freshwater Dolphins and True Dolphins respectively, though the Pilot-whale, the Beluga, or White Whale, and the Narwhal belong to the latter family. The great commercial value of the oil which all the Cetacea yield, and the special products of some—whalebone, spermaceti, ivory—subject them to relentless persecution, which has vastly diminished their numbers. In fact, the whal-fisheries of this as well as other countries have now dwindled into insignificance, partly on account of the extensive substitution of petroleum and certain vegetable oils, but chiefly because of the great diminution in the number of whales; which conditions have tended to make this industry comparatively unprofitable of recent years. The Right (or Greenland) Whale (Balaena mysticetus), the chief object of pursuit of the whalers, is confined to the Arctic regions. It was formerly thought to extend to the Antarctic circle, but the Cape or Southern Whale (B. australis) is now generally admitted to specific distinction. The former is from sixty to seventy feet long, velvety black above, with the lower parts white; the latter somewhat smaller and of a uniform black. Other species are the Biscay Whale (B. biscaiyensis), the object of a fishery by the Basques down to the end of the eighteenth century; the Japan whale (B. japonica), and the South Pacific whale (B. antipodarum). They are exceedingly alike in habit, and they do not differ greatly in appearance. [HUMPBACKED-WHALES, PHYSETER, II., RORQUAL, ZEUGLIDON.]

2. Script.: The rendering of Gr. κίτος (kítos) = any sea monster or large fish, in Matt. xii. 40, in the A. V., and in the text (not the margin) of the R. V. It was taken from the Septuagint of Jonah ii. 1, 11. The Hebrew has simply דג גדול (dag gadol) = great fish; probably the White Shark (q.v.).

¶ Very like a whale: A phrase applied to anything very improbable, and denoting disbelief in what is stated. (Shakep.: Hamlet, iii. 2.)

whale-bird, s.

Ornithology:

1. A popular name for Prion vittatus, called also the Duck Petrel, peculiar to the southern hemisphere. Length, about ten inches; plumage light grayish-blue on back, pearly white beneath.

2. A part of the ocean where whale-fishing is carried on.

whale-fishing, s. The act or occupation of catching whales.

whale-headed stork, s.

Ornith.: Balaniceps rex. Called also the Shoe-bird.

whale-house, s.

Zool.: The popular name of the genus Cyamus (q.v.). The species are parasitic on Cetacea, attaching themselves to the skin by means of their claws. Cyamus cetti is said to infest the Scombridae.

whale-ship, s. A ship engaged in whale-fishing.

"As far as the whale-ships go."
Longfellow: Discoverer of the North Cape.

 whale-shot, s. An old name for spermaceti.

 whale's bone, s. An old term for ivory, perhaps from the circumstance that the ivory of Western Europe in the Middle Ages was the tooth of the walrus, which may have been confounded with the whale. (Nares.)

"To show his teeth as white as whale's bone."
Shakep.: Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

whale, v.t. [A variant of wale (q.v.).] To lash with stripes; to thrash; to beat; to whack.

whale's-bäck, s. A steamship having its main decks rounded over, and generally with its cabin and upper works built upon stout pillars, thus allowing a heavy sea to wash completely over the hull without damage. Used in the heavy carrying trade on the Great Lakes and elsewhere.

whale-bone, s. [Eng. whale, s., and bone.] A horny substance, occurring in long, thin plates, fringed at the edges, and acting as a strainer to detain the whale's food when the animal ejects the water which it has swallowed with the medusa and small fry which constitute its food. The principal source of whalebone is the "right whale," so called, the Balaena mysticetus or australis. Some 800 of these plates are found in the mouth of an adult whale, and vary from ten to fifteen feet in length. Being very flexible, strong, elastic, and light, whalebone is employed for many purposes, as for ribs to umbrellas and parasols, for stiffening ladies' corsets, &c. Also, and more properly, called baleen.

whalebone-whales, s. pl.

Zool.: The Mystacoceti (q.v.). More properly called Baleen Whales.

whale'-man, s. [Eng. whale, s., and man.] A man employed in whale-fishing.

wháp'-pling, a. [Eng. whap; -ing.] Very large or out of the way; whopping. (Slang.)

whar, whaur, adv. [WHERE.] (Scotch.)

whárf, * warf, * wharfé (pl. whárfis, whárves), s. [A.S. hwærf = a dam or bank to keep out water, from hwearf, pa. t. of hwearfan = to turn, to turn about; cogn. with Dut. warf = a wharf, a yard; Icel. hvarf = a turning away, a shelter, from hwearf, pa. t. of hwearfa = to turn; Dan. værft = a wharf, a dockyard; Sw. varf = a shipbuilder's yard; O. Sw. hvarf, from hwearfa = to turn, to return. The original meaning seems thus to have been a turning or turning-place; hence applied to a dam or embankment which served to turn away or aside the water.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A landing-place for cargoes; a sort of quay, constructed of wood or stone, on the margin of a river, harbour, or roadstead, alongside which ships or barges are brought to discharge or take in cargo.

"Near the town a wharf of wood is run out to a proper distance for the convenience of landing and shipping goods."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. iii., ch. xiv.

1. Legal wharfs: Certain wharfs in all seaports appointed by commission from the Court of Exchequer or legalized by Act of Parliament. (English.)

2. Sufferance wharfs: [SUFFERANCE-WHARF.]

wharf-boat, s. A kind of boat moored on a river, and used as a substitute for a wharf where the rise of the water is so variable as to render a fixed wharf unserviceable.

 whárf, v.t. [WHARF, s.]

1. To guard or secure by a wharf or firm wall of timber or stone. [WHARFING, 2.]

"Two elms . . . set on the very brink of a ditch . . . wharfed with a wall of a brick and a half in thickness."—Evelyn: Sylva, bk. i., ch. ii.

2. To place or lodge on a wharf.

whárf'-age (age as ig), s. [Eng. wharf; -age.]

1. The duty or toll paid for the privilege of using a wharf for loading or discharging cargo.

"Without paying wharfage, pontage, or pannaage."—Hackluyt: Voyages, i. 135.

2. A wharf or wharfs collectively.

"The massive stone wharfage that lines the glorious river."—Scridner's Magazine, August, 1880, p. 559.

whárf'-ing, s. [Eng. wharf; -ing.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A structure in the form of a wharf; materials of which a wharf is constructed; wharfs in general. (Evelyn.)

2. Hydr.-eng.: A mode of facing sea-walls and embankments by means of driving upright planks in the manner of sheet-piles, the joints being backed by other planks, and the whole secured by land-ties and tightly-driven earth in the rear.

whárf'-in-gër, s. [A corrupt. of wharfager; cf. messenger, passenger, &c.] A person who owns or has the charge of a wharf.

"Mr. Winkle is a wharfinger, sir, at the canal, sir."—Dickens: Pickwick, ch. 1.

 whárfle, * whárf'-ing, s. [Prob. from the sound.] Inability to pronounce the letter r; a burr.

"The Northumberland R, or Wharfle."—Defoe: Four thro' Great Britain, iii. 233.

whárf, s. [See def.] A local name for Trent sand (q.v.).

† wharre, s. [Wel. chweru = austere, bitter.] Bot.: The crab-apple tree.

Whárf-tón, s. [See def.] The discoverer of the duct and jelly which follow.

Wharton's duct, s.

Anat.: The duct of the submaxillary gland.

Wharton's jelly, s.

Anat.: Jelly-like connective or mucous tissue, occurring at an early stage of embryonic development.

whárves, s. pl. [WHARF, s.]

whase, poss. pron. [WHOSE.] (Scotch.)

whät, * whatte, pron., adv., & s. [A.S. hwæt, neut. of hwá = who (q.v.); cogn. with Dut. wat; Icel. hvát; Dan. hvad; Sw. hvad; Ger. was; Lat. quid; Goth. hwata.]

A. As pronoun:

(1) Substantively:

"What seeest thou in the ground?"
Shakep.: Venus & Adonis, 118.

bél, bóy; pòut, jòwl; cat, çell, chorns, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shùn; -tion, -sion = zhùn. -cious, -tious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c.: = bèl, del.

(2) Adjectively:

"What great danger dwells upon my suit?"
Shakesp.: Venus & Adonia, 202.

2. Used absolutely in introducing a question emphatically, or somewhat in the manner of an interjection, and equivalent to "Do you mean to say that?" "Can it be that?" or the like.

"What, could ye not watch with me one hour?"—Matthew xxvi. 40.

3. Used to introduce an intensive or emphatic phrase or exclamation.

(1) Adjectively = how great! how extraordinary! how remarkable!

"What a sight it was!"
Shakesp.: Venus & Adonia, 243.

(2) Adverbially = to what a degree! to what an extent! how greatly! how remarkably!

"What fine change is in the music!"
Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, iv. 2.

4. Having the force of a compound relative pronoun.

(1) Substantively = the thing (or things) which, that which.

"Controlling what he was controlled with."
Shakesp.: Venus & Adonia, 270.

(2) Adjectively = the . . . which, the sort of thing . . . which, such . . . as.

"What strength I have in mine own."
Shakesp.: Tempest, (Epilogue).

(3) Referring to a preceding substantive = that (or those) which, such as.

"Draw no swords but what are sanctified."
Shakesp.: 3 Henry IV, iv. 4.

5. Used for who, but only in the predicate.

"What is this mold?" Shakesp.: Tempest, v.

6. What thing or person soever; whatever or whoever, whatsoever or whosoever.

"Be what thou wilt, thou art my prisoner."
Shakesp.: 1 Henry VI, v. 2.

7. Partly by; partly in consequence of. (Now always followed by with.)

"What with the war, what with the sweat, what with the fallows, and what with poverty, I am custom-drunk."
Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, 1. 2.

8. Used elliptically, in certain phrases, as—

(1) What if = what would be the consequence if? what will it matter if? what would you say if?

"What if this mixture do not work at all?"
Shakesp.: Romeo & Juliet, iv. 2.

(2) What of = what follows from? why do you mention? what is the matter with?

"All this is so, but what of this, my lord?"
Shakesp.: Much Ado, iv. 1.

¶ In the expression, What of the night? (Isa. xxi. 11) there is an ellipsis of the word "part," so that the inquiry is, What remains of the night? How much of it is past? The Vulgate, however (Quid de nocte?) follows the commoner but less correct interpretation, What tidings as to the state of the night?

(3) Hence, What of that? = no matter, never mind.

"The night is spent, why, what of that?"
Shakesp.: Venus & Adonia, 717.

(4) What though = what does it matter though? granting or supposing that; admitting that.

"What though care killed a cat."—Shakesp.: Much Ado, v. 1.

¶ Also used alone = no matter, never mind, it is all one.

"But what though! courage!"
Shakesp.: As You Like It, III. 2.

9. In such obsolete or poetical phrases as what time, what day, what hour, &c., what = at the time, day, &c., when.

"I made thee miserable,
What time I threw the people's suffrages
On him." Shakesp.: Titus Andronicus, iv. 3.

10. In such phrases as I'll tell you what, &c., what either anticipates the succeeding statement, or is used to lay some stress on what is about to be stated, and not as of merely introducing a clause communicating information.

* B. As adverb:

1. For what purpose; why.

"What tell you me of it?"
Shakesp.: 2 Henry IV, t. 2.

2. In or to a certain degree.

"And then she a little what smiling said, (paulliter arridens)."—Chaucer: Boccus, bk. iv.

* C. As substantive:

1. Something, thing, staff.

"Come down, and learne the little what,
That Thoumalin cau saide."
Spenser: Shepherd's Calendar; July.

2. A certain quantity.

"Then the kynge anone called his seruaunt, that hadde hadt one lufe and a lytell whatte of wyne."
Folgan: Chronycle, ch. cxxxii.

¶ (1) To know what's what: To know the nature of things; to have a sufficient knowledge, judgment, or experience; to be knowing. (Slang.) (Udal: Roister Doister, l. 2.)

(2) What else? (elliptical for What else can be?): A phrase formerly used as a strong affirmative, as if equivalent to "Could you imagine anything else to be the case?"

(3) What ho! An exclamation of calling.

(4) What not: A term used in concluding an enumeration of several articles, or particulars, and forming an abbreviated or elliptical clause, generally equivalent to "What may I not add or mention?" "et cetera."

(5) What's his (its) name? What do you call it? &c.: Colloquial phrases, generally used to signify that the speaker cannot supply a definite name for some person or thing, or that the name has slipped his memory, or that the person or thing is of so trivial consequence as not to be deserving of a specific name. The phrase is often formed into a compound, as, Tell Mr. What's-his-name to come.

* what-like, a. Of what kind, appearance, or character.

* what'-a-bouts, adv. [Eng. what, and about.] On what business.

"Might know of all my goings on, and whatabouts and whatabouts from Henry Taylor."—Southey: Letters, iv. 170.

whät-e'er, pron. [See def.] A contracted form of whatever, used in poetry.

"He strikes whät-e'er is in his way."
Shakesp.: Venus & Adonia, 622.

whät-ëv'-ër, pron. [Eng. what, and ever.] 1. Substantively: Anything soever that; be it what it may that; the thing or things of any kind that; all that.

"Whät-er is is right"
Pope: Essay on Man, iv. 145.

2. Adjectively: Of any kind soever; no matter what.

"Whatever occasion keeps him from us now."
Shakesp.: 2 Henry VI, III. 1.

3. Interrogatively: What in the world. (Colloq.)

* whät'-ness, s. [Eng. what; -ness.] Metaph.: A quiddity.

"Pressing for definition, you never get much further than that each given quiddity means a certain whät-ness."—Fortnightly Review, March, 1867, p. 335.

whät'-nôt, s. [Eng. what, and not.] A piece or stand of furniture, having shelves for papers, books, &c.; an étagère.

* whät'-sô, a. or pron. [Eng. what, and so.] Whatever (q.v.).

whät-sô-e'er, pron. [See def.] A contracted form of whatsoever, used in poetry.

"To doom the offenders, whätsoe'er they be."
Shakesp.: Richard III, III. 4.

whät-sô-ëv'-ër, a. [Eng. what, so, and ever.] No matter what thing or things; a more emphatic word than whatever, and like it used adjectively or substantively.

"And into whätsoe'er city or town ye shall enter, inquire who in it is worthy."—Matthew x. 11.

whäup, whäup, s. [Etym. doubtful; perhaps from its cry. See extract.]

Ornith.: The Curlew (q.v.).

"In Scotland, where it is generally distributed during the breeding season in suitable localities, frequenting the coasts during the rest of the year, the curlew is called a whäup, or whäup, which in Jamieson's Scottish Dictionary is said to be a name for a goldfinch, supposed to go about under the eaves of houses after nightfall, having a long beak."—Farrall: Brit. Birds (ed. 4th), III. 591, 592.

whéal (1), s. [Corn. huel = a mine.] A mine, especially a tin-mine.

whéal (2), s. [WEAL.]

1. A weal or wale.

2. A pimple or pustule.

wheal-worm, s. The harvest-bug (q.v.).

wheat, 'whete, s. [A.S. hwæite; Icel. hveiti; Sw. hrete; Dan. hvede; Dut. weite, weit; Goth. hwæiti, hwæites; Ger. weizen, weizen.] Named from its white colour, which distinguishes it from rye, and from the black oats and the black barley of Northern Asia.]

Bot.: Triticum vulgare, an annual cereal grass, possessing a four-cornered imbricated spike, with four-flowered spikelets, having their valves ventricose, ovate, truncate, muronate, compressed under the apex, the nerves somewhat prominent. Its native country is not known, but has been supposed to be Persia or Siberia. The plant may have been so altered by cultivation as now to be very different from the parent. Fabre and Prof. Beckman think that it may have been developed from Ægilops (q.v.), a genus allied to Triticum, though Henfrey objects to this identification. Wheat was cultivated from an early period in Egypt and the neighbouring countries [2.], as also by the Greeks, the Romans, &c. Now it has spread over a great part of the world, flourishing in climates considerably differing from each other. In the European and Asiatic zone, which includes France, England and part of Scotland, part of Germany, Hungary, the Crimea, Mount Caucasus, and part of Central Asia, wheat is almost the only cereal cultivated; in a zone a little further north it is associated with rye. The great wheat-producing country of the present day, however, is the United States, and particularly the states of the northern Mississippi basin, the wheat production of this region affording not only for this country, but to supply the surplus demands of the countries of Europe. This great wheat-producing region, in fact, has been looked upon as the wheat granary of the world, but other countries are now coming into competition with it, particularly the Canadian provinces lying north of it. At present there are more than 38,000,000 acres in the United States devoted to wheat production, the total crop being, in 1890, nearly 400,000,000 bushels, in 1891, 545,000,000 bushels. Russia comes second in acreage, and France third, while India has also a large acreage in wheat.

(2) Script.: (1) חִטָּה (chittah), (Gen. ix. 14); (2) בָּר (bôr), or בָּר (bar) (Amoa v. 11, vil. 5); (3) דָּגָן (dagan) (Num. xviii. 12); (4) רִתְּיָהוּ (riti'photh) (Prov. xxvii. 22).

wheat-barley, s. [NAKED-BARLEY.]

wheat-drill, s. [GRAIN-DRILL.]

wheat-ear, s. An ear of wheat.

wheat-eel, s. A disease in wheat, called also Ear-ckockle and Purples.

wheat-fly, s.

Entom.: Cecidomyia tritici; a yellow and orange coloured two-winged fly, about a tenth of an inch long, with black eyes, the female of which deposits her eggs in the heart of the wheat blossom. These eggs soon give exit to yellow or orange-coloured larvae, popularly known as red maggots, which feed on the reproductive organs of the plant, preventing the seed from coming to perfection. When full-grown they descend the stem, and undergo their transformation into the chrysalis state in the earth.

wheat-grass, s.

Bot.: Various species of Triticum (q.v.).

wheat-midge, s.

Entomology: 1. Cecidomyia tritici. [WHEAT-FLY.]

2. Lasiptera obfusca. It is a small, two-winged fly of a black colour, with habits like those of No. 1.

wheat-mildew, s.

Bot.: Puccinia graminis. [RUST, s., II.]

wheat-moth, s.

Entom.: The Grain-moth (q.v.).

wheat-starch, s.

Micros.: The starch or flour of wheat, frequently used in the adulteration of mustard, pepper, &c. It can be readily identified by the microscope, the larger granules being round and slightly flattened on one side, the smaller ones, when examined by a high power, being distinctly angular.

Each granule has a hilum, or central spot, and many of the larger ones exhibit faintly marked concentric rings.

WHEAT-STARCH. (Magnified 100 diameters.)

wheat-ear, s. [Etym. doubtful. The name has been explained from the arrival of the bird "when the wheat is in the ear; but the reason is fallacious; for the wheatear arrives in Britain before that period, or, according to Fuller (Worthies: Sussex), "because, fattest when wheat is ripe, whereon it feeds." Some connect the name with A.S. hwæt = keen, a supposed keenness of hearing being suggested by the decided marking of the feathers near the auditory apertures. Halliwell gives Linc. whitter = to complain. Smollett (Travels, lett. fil.) says the name is corrupted from white-ear, which is supported by the French name cul blanc, and the English names White-tail, White-rump.]

Ornith.: Savicola oenanthe; called also the Fallow-chat and Fallow-finch. A well-known British visitant, arriving about the early part of March and remaining till the end of autumn. Length about six inches; upper parts light silver-gray, with patch of white on rump; Quill-feathers, coverts, middle tail-feathers, and tips of rectrices (which are white), deep black; black streak from edge of beak to ear, enveloping the eye and spreading to ear-coverts; breast, orange-buff; belly, white. These birds are in excellent condition in August and September, and many thousands are taken in traps every year for the table, under the name of British Ortolans.

"The wheat-ear is another early visitor. It is supposed to be the Laureate's sea-bird of March, but I believe he has never spoken conclusively on the point."—St. James's Gazette, March 3, 1857.

wheat-ear, a. [Eng. wheat; -ear.] Made of wheat; obtained from wheat.

"His diet was of wheaten bread,
And milk, and oats, and straw."
Cooper: Epitaph on a Hero.

Wheat-stone, s. [See def.] Sir C. Wheatstone, the electrician (1802-75).

Wheatstone's bridge, s. [ELECTRIC-BRIDGE.]

wheder, pron. or conj. [WHETHER.] wheel-die, v. t. & i. [According to Skeat, probably for wheele, from Ger. wedeln = to wag the tail, to fan, from wedel = a fan, a tail, a brush; M. H. Ger. wadel; O. H. Ger. wadot = a tail.]

A. Transitive:

1. To entice with soft words; to gain over by coaxing and flattery; to coax, to cajole, to flatter.

"A fox stood heking of his lips at the cock, and wheeling him to get him down."—L'Étranger: Fables.

2. To gain or procure by flattery or coaxing. "I have already a deed of settlement of the best part of her estate, which I wheeled out of her; and that you shall partake at least."—Congress: Way of the World, III.

3. To gain from by coaxing or flattery. (Followed by out of before the thing gained.) "He wheeled Tillotson out of some money."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xviii.

B. Intrans.: To flatter, to coax, to cajole. "A laughing, toying, wheeling, whimpering she."
Rose: Jane Shore, I.

wheel-die, s. [WHEELDIE, v.] Enticement, coaxing, flattery.

wheel'd-lér, s. [Eng. wheel(l)e, v.; -er.] One who wheedles, coaxes, or cajoles.

wheel'd-líng, pr. par., a., & s. [WHEELDIE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: Coaxing, flattering, cajoling. "By murr'ring, wheeling, stratagem, and force."
Pope: Wife of Bath, 163.

wheel'd-líng-lý, adv. [Eng. wheel(l)ing; -ly.] In a wheedling manner; with coaxing or flattery.

"'Can't you do nothing for him?' she said wheel(l)ingly."—J. S. Lo Faro: In a Glass Darkly, I, 246.

wheel, *weol, *wheole, s. [A.S. hwéol, hwéol, hwéowol; cogn. with Dut. wiel; Icel. hjól; Dan. hjul; Sw. hjul.]

I. Ordinary language:

1. A circular frame or solid disc turning on an axis. The essential feature of a wheel is rotation, partial or entire. Its motion may be intermittent, oscillatory, or continuous. Its form may be circular or otherwise; its contour regular or irregular. Its function may be to transmit motion or to modify it. Its application may necessitate cogs of a given form, or it may be smooth, its surface being free from contact with other portions of the machine. It may be hollow, for the conveyance or measurement of fluids; or it may be the means of propulsion of fluids; or conversely it may be propelled by them. It may form a support, and, by rotation, be made effective in assisting transportation. As used for vehicles, the wheel has cast-iron hub (nav) and tire, and wrought-iron or wooden spokes. The felly has holes flaring to the outside, so as to hold the ends of the spokes, which have conical heads to fit the openings. The inner ends of the spokes pass through the outer rim of the hub, and are secured by nuts. The insertion of the hubs gives them an extended base or bearing, and strengthens the wheel against lateral strain. Wheels receive different names according to the purpose for which they are used: as, balance-wheel, cog-wheel, crown-wheel, fly-wheel, padle-wheel, pinion-wheel, scap-wheel, tread-wheel, turbine, &c., which will be found described under their respective heads.

2. A machine for spinning yarn or thread; a spinning-wheel (q.v.).

"I see the eldest daughter at her wheel, Spinning amain." Wordsworth: Excursion, VI.

3. In the same sense as II. 1.

4. An apparatus, machine, instrument, or other object having a wheel-like shape, or the essential feature of which is a wheel: as—

(1) The revolving disc used by potters in modelling; a potter's wheel.

"Then I went down to the potter's house, and, behold, he wrought a work on the wheels."—Jeremiah xviii, 2.

(2) An instrument of torture formerly used for criminals of the most atrocious class. In some places it consisted of a carriage-wheel, on which the criminal was placed with his face upwards, and his legs and arms extended along the spokes. On the wheel being moved round, the executioner broke the victim's limbs by successive blows with a hammer or iron bar, and after a more or less protracted interval put an end to his sufferings by two or three severe blows, called coups de grâce (mercy-strokes) on the chest or stomach, or by strangling him. In Germany its use lingered down to the commencement of the nineteenth century.

"Let them pull all about mine ears, present me Death on the wheel, or wild horses' heels!"
Shakspeare: Coriolanus, III, 2.

* (3) A circular body, a disc, an orb.

* (4) A carriage, a chariot.
"A carbuncle of Phebus' wheel."
Shakspeare: Cymbeline, v, 5.

† 5. A circular motion; a revolution; rotation, circumgyration.

"According to the common vicissitude and wheel of things, the proud and the insolent, after long trampling upon others, come at length to be trampled upon themselves."—South.

6. One of the attributes of Fortune as the emblem of mutability.

* 7. The burden or refrain of a ballad.
"You must sing a-down, a-down,
And you call him a-down-a-O, how the wheel becomes it!"
Shakspeare: Hamlet, IV, 5.

8. A bicycle, safety, &c.

II. Technically:

1. Naut.: A tiller-wheel; a steering-wheel (q.v.).

2. Pyrotechnics: A firework of a circular shape, which, while burning, revolves on an axis by the action of the escaping gas.

† 1. To break upon the wheel: To subject to the punishment described under WHEEL, s., 1, 4, (2).

2. To break a fly (butterfly, &c.) on the wheel:

(1) To subject to a punishment out of all proportion to the gravity of the offence and importance of the offender.

(2) To employ great means or exertions for trifling ends.

3. To put one's shoulder to the wheel: [SHOULDER, s.].

4. Wheel and axle: A modification of the lever (q.v.), and one of the mechanical powers. Its most simple form is a cylindrical axle, on which a concentric wheel is firmly fastened, the whole being suspended horizontally. When this power is employed to raise heavy weights, the weight is attached to a rope wound round the axle, and the power applied to a rope placed in the grooved rim of the wheel, or to a handle fixed at right angles to the rim of the wheel, for which an ordinary winch may be substituted. From the diagram it will be seen that this machine is a lever, the extremities of which are not points as in the normal form [LEVER, s.], but the circumference of the circles (the wheel and the axle), whose radii are C A, C B respectively. Hence the power and the weight are not attached to particular points in these circumferences, but to cords wound round them; and the imaginary simple lever A B (formed by joining the points A, B, where the cords become tangents to the circles) remains unaltered in position and magnitude. The conditions of equilibrium are that $P \times C A = W \times C B$; or, since the circumferences of circles are proportional to their radii, that $P : W ::$ circumference of the axle : the circumference of the wheel (or, if a winch is employed, the circumference of the revolution described by the power).

5. Wheel of life: [ZOETROPE].

6. Wheels within wheels: A complication of circumstances, motives, influences, or the like.

wheel-animalcules, s. pl. [ROTIFERA.]

* wheel-band, s. The tire of a wheel. "Disrupted from the horses' hoofs, and from the wheel-band's beat."
Chapman: Homer; Iliad XI, 466.

wheel-barometer, s. [BAROMETRES.]

wheel-barrow, *wheele-barrow, s. A sort of hand-machine, consisting of a frame with two handles or trams, and frequently a box, supported on a single wheel and rolled by a single individual.

"Who [Flemings] had brought their horses and carriages, and wheele-barrowes, and planks for their barrowes to runne upon."—Hacthugst: Voyages, III, 62.

wheel-bird, s.

Ornith.: One of the many popular names of the Goatsucker (Caprimulgus europaeus). It has reference to the fancied resemblance of the note of the bird to the noise of a spinning-wheel.

wheel-boat, s. A boat with wheels, to be used either on water or on inclined planes or railways.

wheel-bug, s. [ARLUS.]

wheel-carriage, s. A carriage moved on wheels, as a coach, gig, waggon, cart, railway carriage, &c.

wheel-chair, s. A bath-chair; so invalid a chair.

wheel-coulter, s.

Agric.: A sharp-edged wheel running in advance of the breast of the plough, to cut the sod or weeds in the line of the furrow. It has long been used in the fen-lands.

wheel-cutting, s. The operation of cutting the teeth in the wheels used by watch and clock makers, and for other mechanical purposes.

wheel-fire, s. A fire encompassing a crucible without touching it.

wheel-guard plate, s.

Ordn.: An iron guard on each side of the stock of a field or siege gun-carriage, to prevent its being chafed by the wheels when turning. Used also on carriages.

wheel-horse, s. The same as WHEELER. "The wheel-horse rider of one of the captured Federal teams took in the situation at a glance."—Field, Sept. 4, 1866.

wheel-house, s.

Naut.: A kind of round house, built over the steering-wheel in large ships, for the shelter of the steersman.

wheel-jack, s. A lifting-jack with a low toe, to catch beneath the tire of a wheel.

wheel-lathe, s. A lathe for turning railway-wheels and other large work.

wheel-lock, s.

* 1. Firearms: A form of lock consisting of a furrowed wheel of steel, whose friction against a piece of flint produced sparks which ignited the priming.

2. Locksmithing: A letter-lock (q.v.).

wheel-ore, s. [Ger. rüdelezer.]

Min.: A name given by the miners of ból, boy; pout, jowl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -íng. -clan, -tian = shán. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -sious = shüs. -bia, -dle, &c. = bpl, dpl.

Kapnik, Hungary, to a variety of Bonmonita (q.v.) occurring in wheel-like groups of crystals.

wheel-pit, s. A walled hole for the heavy fly-wheel of a train of rolls, &c.

1. A plough supported in part by a wheel or wheels as a gauge of depth.

2. A plough with a wheel in the space between the landside and mould-board, and reducing the friction of the plough by bearing the weight.

wheel-race, s. The place in which a water-wheel is fixed.

wheel-rope, s.

Naut.: A rope rove through a block on each side of the deck, and led round the barrel of the steering-wheel to assist in steering. Chains are now much more commonly used for the purpose.

wheel-shaped, a. Shaped like a wheel; rotate (q.v.).

wheel-swarf, s. A clisy cement or putty, made in Sheffield from the dust derived from abrasion of the grindstones, and used in furnaces where steel is manufactured for coating the layers of iron and charcoal.

wheel-tire, s. The iron band which encircles a wooden wheel. [TIRE (2), s.] wheel-train, s. A number of wheels so arranged that the revolution of one causes the revolution of all.

Gothic Arch.: A circular window with radiating mullions resembling the spokes of a wheel. [ROSE-WINDOW.]

wheel-work, s. The combination of wheels which communicate motion to one another in machinery, the motion being communicated from the one wheel to the other by belts or straps passing over the circumferences of both, or by teeth cut in those circumferences and working in one another, or by cogs. 1. Literally:

(1) To sharpen; to make sharp by rubbing on a stone or similar substance.

"The bows they bend, and the knives they whet."

Scott: Lady of the Lake, IV. 25.

(2) To rub with or on a stone or similar substance for the purpose of sharpening.

(3) To sharpen generally.

"Here roams the wolf, the eagle whets his beak."

Byron: Childe Harold, II. 42.

2. Figuratively:

(1) To make sharp, keen, or eager; to excite, to stimulate.

"The usual prefaces amongst such people to whet each other's courage."—Clarendon: Religion & Policy, ch. IX.

(2) To provoke; to make angry or acrimonious.

"Since Cassius first did whet us against Caesar."

Shaksp.: Julius Caesar, II. 1.

¶ To whet on, To whet forward: To urge on; to instigate.

"What on Warwick to this enterprise."

Shaksp.: 8 Henry VI, I. 5.

* whét, s. [WHER, v.]

1. The act of whetting or sharpening by friction.

2. Something which whets or stimulates the appetite.

"An ivory tangle is a certain whet:

You would not think how heartily he'll eat."

Dryden: Jurinal xi.

whéth-ér, * weth-er, * whed-ir, pron., adj., & conj. [A.S. hwæðer = which of two; cogn. with Icel. hvarr; M. H. Ger. weder; O. H. Ger. hwedar; Goth. hwathar. Formed with comparative suffix from hwá = who.]

A. As pron.: Which of two; which one of two. (Used interrogatively and relatively.)

"Whether of those twain did the will of his father?"

—Matthew xxi. 31.

B. As adj.: Which of two.

"And so wrought,

That when the father him brought,

And sigh'd to whether side it drogh."

Greene: C. A., II.

C. As conjunction:

* 1. Used as the sign of a question.

"Whether is not this the son of a carpenter?"—Wycliffe: Matthew xiii.

2. Which of two or more alternatives; used to introduce the first of a series of alternative clauses, the succeeding clause or clauses being connected by or or whethér.

"Thou shalt speak my words unto them, whethér they will hear, or whethér they will forbear."—Ezekiel II. 7.

¶ (1) Sometimes the correlative clause is simply a negative.

"You have said; but whethér wisely or no, let the forest judge."—Shaksp.: As You Like It, III. 2.

(2) In many cases, where the second of two alternatives is the mere negative of the first, the second is omitted, and whethér stands without any correlative, and has simply the force of if.

"And now who knows

But you, Lorenzo, whethér I am young?"

Shaksp.: Merchant of Venice, II. 6.

¶ Whether or no: In either alternative; as, I will go whethér or no.

* whéth-ér, adv. [WITHER.]

whéth-ér-íng, s. [Etym. doubtful.] The retention of the after-birth in cows.

whét-íle, s. [See def.]

Ornith.: A woodpecker (q.v.).

"In some countries a Woodpecker is called a 'Whét-íle,' and in others a 'Wood-wale.'—Two words which seem to have the same derivation. The first has been supposed to be merely a corruption of whittle—a knife—formerly written 'whitel,' but a still more ancient form of this word is 'hwitel,' which renders the conjecture very unlikely. On the other hand, 'Woodwale,' or 'Woodwall,' may be traced from 'Wit-wall,' as found in Holyland's Dictionarie—cognate with the Low-Dutch Witewal, and the Old-German Witerraal . . . of which Whét-íle is but an easy corruption; and it is certain that, whatever the second syllable may mean, the first is only wood—in old Anglo-Saxon widu. . . In some form or other the word occurs not infrequently in old poems."—Farrall: Brit. Birds (ed. 4th), II. 461, 462.

whét-sláte, s. [Eng. whet, v., and slate.] [WHERSTONE, II.]

whét-stóne, s. [A.S. hwætstán.] [WHER, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: A piece of stone, usually a rectangular slab, used for sharpening cutlery or tools. Scythe-stones are bellied, and taper toward the ends. Many varieties of stone, especially of the slaty kinds, are more or less perfectly adapted for the purpose. Some, however, are peculiarly suited for imparting a fine edge to tools, command a high price, and are generally used in the workshop as oilstones.

"I'd rather, I

Be like a whetstone, that an edge can put

On steel, though't self be dull and cannot cut."

Ben Jonson: Horace; Art of Poetry.

2. Fig.: Anything which sharpens, excites, or stimulates.

II. Petrol.: A siliceous clay-slate, compact and of homogeneous texture. Used for sharpening edge-tools. Called also Whetstone and Whetstone-slate.

¶ To give the whetstone, To deserve the whetstone: Old phrases, in which the whetstone is associated with lying, and regarded as the proper premium for accomplishment in that art.

whetstone-slate, s. [WHERSTONE, II.]

* whétte, v.t. [WHER, v.]

whét-tér, s. [Eng. whet, v.; -er.]

1. One who or that which whets, sharpens, or stimulates.

"The air upon Eustated Downs is nothing to it for a whetter; yet I never see it, but the spirit of famine appears to me."—Congress: Love for Love, I.

2. One who indulges in whets or drams; a tippler; a dram-drinker.

"The whetter is obliged to refresh himself every moment with a liquor as the snuff-taker with a powder."

—Steels: Tatler, No. 141.

whew (ew as ü), interj. or s. [From the sound made.] A sound expressive of astonishment, aversion, or contempt.

"Lepet suppressed a whew."—Hannay: Singleton Fontenay.

whew-éil-ite (whew as hu), s. [After the late Prof. Howell of Cambridge; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A rare monoclinic mineral occurring in well-defined, mostly twinned crystals on calcite (q.v.), of unknown locality, though suggested by Quenstedt, from Hungary. Hardness, 2.5 to 2.75; lustre, vitreous to sub-resinous; brittle; fracture, conchoidal. Compos.: an oxalate of lime.

whew-ér (ew as ü), s. [Eng. whew, v.; -er.]

Ornith.: The widgeon (q.v.).

"The note of the Widgeon is a shrill whistle, and in some parts of England it is in consequence called the Wew-duck and Whewer."—Farrall: Brit. Birds (ed. 4th), IV. 490.

whew, s. [A.S. hwæg; cogn. with Dut. hul, wei; cf. Wel. chwig = whey fermented with sour herbs.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The serum or watery part of milk separated from the more thick or coagulable part, especially in the process of making cheese, in which process the thick part is termed curd, and the thin whey. Various preparations of whey are medicinally used as astringents.

"In sight of the fields and castles which they regarded as their own, they had been glad to be invited by a peasant to partake of his whey and his potatoes."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

2. Chem.: [SEAW, 2.]

* whew-face, s. A pale-faced person. (Used in contempt.)

"What soldiers, whew-face!"

Shaksp.: Macbeth, v. 3.

* whew-faced, a. Pale-faced.

"As many whew-faced girls."—Richardson: Clarissa, VI. 3.

whew-éy, a. [Eng. whew; -ey.] Of the nature of whey; resembling whey.

which, whilk, wich, wuch, welche, * which, pron. [A.S. hwic, hwela, hwylic, a contracted form of hwilic = why-like, from hwit, hweg = why (from hwed = who), and lic = like; cogn. with O. Sax. hwilic, from hwit = why, and lik = like; O. Fries. hwelik, hwelk, hwelk; Dnt. wele; Icel. hwilkr = of what kind, from hwit, instrumental case of hwerr = who, and likr = like; Dan. hwilken (inasc.), hwilket (neut.); Sw. hwilken, hwilket; Ger. welcher; O. H. Ger. hwelick, from hweto = how, and lik = like; Goth. hwelika, from hwet instrumental case of hwes = what, and leiks = like; Lat. qualis = of what sort. As an interrogative pronoun, which is used of any gender, but as a relative it is now only neuter.]

1. An interrogative pronoun, by which one or more out of a number of persons or things, frequently one out of two, is inquired for or is desired to be pointed out or definitively described.

* Which of you convinced me of sin?—John viii. 44.

2. A relative pronoun, serving as the neuter of who, and having as its antecedent one or more persons or things. It is now confined to things; such expressions as "Our father which art in heaven" being now obsolete. Sometimes the antecedent is a clause or sentence: as, He is ill, which I am sorry for.

3. Used adjectively, or with a noun, the relative coming before the noun.

* What I will do way is he gone? he ran to me.
 Chaucer: C. T., 4, 076.

4. Used as an indefinite pronoun, standing for whichever, any one which, that which, those which, or the like: as, Take which you please.

¶ (1) Which was formerly frequently preceded by the.

* Do they not blaspheme that worthy name by the which ye are called?—James ii. 7.

(2) Which was formerly sometimes followed by as or that, with the effect of emphasis or definiteness.

(3) It was also sometimes followed by the indefinite article.

* I shall him tellen which a gret honour it is.
 Chaucer: C. T., 9, 675.

(4) Which is which: Which is the one and which the other. A phrase commonly used to denote liability to distinguish between two persons or things.

(5) Which sometimes had whose as its genitive.

* Of man's first disobedience, and the fruit of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste brought death into the world.
 Milton: P. L., l. 2.

which-év-ér, which-sò-év-ér, pron.
 [Eng. which; ever, soever.] Whether one or the other; no matter which. (Used both as an adjective and a noun: as, Take which-ever rod you please; whichever of the roads he takes.)

whid-dah, why-dah, s. [Native name.]

Geog.: A maritime province of Dahomey, on the Bight of Benin.

whidah-bird, whydah-bird, s.

Ornith.: The Widow-bird (Vidua paradisæ), or Broad-shafted Whidah-bird, from equatorial West Africa. Male black on head, back, and tail; brilliant red upon the nape and lower parts of the body; female brownish yellow on head, breast and borders of wings rose colour. Length of body about five inches, tail eleven inches; female somewhat smaller. The song is simple but pleasing, and these birds are brought to Europe in considerable numbers and sold as cage birds. They are generally called by dealers Birds of Paradise, and sometimes Paradise Widow-birds. Used in a wider sense of any species of the genus Vidua (q.v.). The name Widow-bird, or Widow, is also applied with a qualifying epithet to allied genera; the species of Colinus appear being popularly known as Mourning Widows, and the single species of Chera (Chera castra) as the Long-tailed Widow-bird.

whidah-finch, whydah-finch, s.

Ornithology:

1. The Whidah-bird (q.v.).

* The bird on the wing is the whidah-finch, remarkable for the enormous plumes with which the tail of the male bird is decorated during the breeding season.
 —Wallace: Geog. Diet. Arctica, l. 204.

2. Any species of the genus Vidua, consisting of tropical and South-African finches, with long wings and a boat-shaped tail, the two middle feathers of which become excessively lengthened in the male in the breeding season, and drop off when incubation is over. Most of the species seek their food on the ground, generally subsisting on grass seeds and insects; but they pass a considerable portion of the breeding season among the branches of trees, as affording the most convenient situation for the bestowal of their abnormally long tails, whilst some are found inhabiting the reedy parts of the continent in the neighbourhood of great rivers. Their nests closely resemble those of the Weaver-birds. The best known species are the Vidua paradisæ (Widow-bird) and V. erythrocephalus, the Red-billed Whidah-finch, which is somewhat smaller.

whiff (2), whigg, s. & a. [For etym. see extract.]

A. As substantives:

Eng. Hist.: A term applied to the members of one of the great political parties in Great Britain. Originally it was a Scottish term, and appears to have been first used in Scotland in the reign of Charles I., and in England in that of Charles II. According to Bishop Burnet's account (Own Times, bk. i.) of the origin of the word:

* *The north-west counties of Scotland have seldom corn enough to serve them all the year round, and the northern parts producing more than they used, those in the west went in summer to buy at Leith the stores that came from the north. From the word whiggam, used in driving their horses, all that drove were called the whiggamors, contracted into whigs. Now in the year before the news came down of duke Hamilton's defeat, the ministers animated their people to rise and march to Edinburgh; and they came up marching on the head of their parishes, with an ensign of fury, praying and prescribing all the way as they came. The marquis of Argyll and his party came and headed them, they being about 6,000. This was called the "Whiggamors' march"; and ever after that all who opposed the court came in contempt to be called whigs.*

From Scotland the term was transferred to England, and was applied to the political party opposed to the Tories. It was first assumed as a party name by those who were chiefly instrumental in placing William III. on the throne. As a political term it has now almost fallen out of use, being superseded by the term Liberal, the more extreme members of which party have assumed the name of Radicals. [LIBERAL, RADICAL, TOBY, WHIGDOMORE.] During the colonial and revolutionary period of the United States the term Whig was applied to those who opposed the British rule, those who favored it being styled Tories. In 1834 it was adopted as the name of the successors of the old National Republican party. The Whig party died out after 1852, and was succeeded by the present Republican party.

B. As adj.: Pertaining or relating to the Whigs; composed of or proposed by Whigs.

* Attached to the Whig party.—Burke: Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs.

whin'-ny, s. [WHINNY, v.] The act of whinnying; a neigh.

whin'-stone, *quhin-stane, *quhyn-stane, s. [Etym. doubtful; prob. from Eng. whin (1), and stone.]

Petrol.: A term used in Scotland as synonymous with greenstone (q.v.), but applied by miners and quarrymen to any hard, resisting rock which comes in the way of their operations. (Page.)

*whin'-yard, *whin'-i-ard, s. [Etym. doubtful; perhaps from A.S. winnan = to fight; and gear = a rod, a yard.] A sword or hanger. "He snatched'd his whinyard op."—Butler: Hudibras, I, II.

whip, *whip-pen, *whyp-pyn, v.t. & i. [Original meaning, to move rapidly; cf. Dut. wippen = to skip, to hasten, to flog; Low Ger. wippen, wippen = to go up and down, as on a seesaw; Dan. vippe = to seesaw, to rock; Sw. rippa = to wag, to jerk, to flog; Ger. wippen = to move up and down, to seesaw, to flog; Gasl. cuip = a whip; Wel. chwip = a quick turn; chwipio = to move briskly or nimbly. The h, therefore, appears not to have belonged to the word originally.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To move suddenly and quickly; to take or seize with a sudden motion; to snatch; to carry, convey, or move suddenly and rapidly. (Generally followed by a preposition, as away, off, out, up, &c.)

"The Sultan, furious, called a mute, and said, 'O Musta, straightway whip me off his head.'"—P. B. Adrich: The World's Way.

2. To make to turn or rotate with lashes: as, To whip a top.

3. To strike with a whip or lash, or with anything tough and flexible; to lash.

"Consideration like an angel came. And whipp'd the offending Adam out of him."—Shakspeare: Henry V, I, 1.

*6. To thrash; to beat out, as grain, by striking: as, To whip wheat.

*7. To lash in a figurative sense; to treat with cutting severity, as with sarcasm, abuse, or the like.

"Will thou whip thine own faults in other men?"—Shakspeare: Timon, v. 1.

8. To beat into a froth, as eggs, cream, &c., with a whisk, fork, spoon, or the like.

9. To fish by casting a line on a stream. [FLYFISHING.]

10. To beat, to overcome, to surpass. (Amer. slang.)

*11. To sew slightly; to form into gathers: as, To whip a ruffle.

12. To sew over and over, as the two selvages of stuffs stitched together.

II. Naut.: To hoist or purchase by means of a rope passed through a single pulley.

B. Intransitive:

1. To move or turn nimbly; to start suddenly and run; to turn and run.

"In fight he sets up his tails, and whips about, turning his tail to the enemy."—P. Holland: Plinie, bk. viii, ch. xlv.

2. (See extract.)

"She and Scully robbed a sailor in Devonshire-street, and Scully was guilty of what is known in Billingsgate as shipping—that is, being interpreted, keeping part of the plunder."—Pall Mall Gazette, Feb. 1, 1888.

¶ 1. To whip in:

(1) Intransitive:

(a) To act as whipper-in (q.v.).

"Also whipped-in for some time to the Bedale."—Field, Nov. 19, 1887.

(b) To come last.

"—whipped in, and to the astonishment of every one an extraordinary stand was made."—Daily Telegraph, July 1, 1888.

(2) Trans.: To keep from scattering, as hounds in a hunt; hence, to bring or keep the members of a party together, as in a legislative assembly.

2. To whip off: To drive hounds off a scent.

"The difficult nature of the covert, and the fact that they were running in view, prevented hounds being whipped off at the outset."—Field, April 4, 1888.

3. To whip the cat:

(1) To practise the most pinching parsimony. (Prov.)

(2) To work from house to house by the day, as a tailor, dressmaker, carpenter, or the like. (Prov.)

"Mr. Hugh Hallburton dilates upon the custom of 'whipping the cat'—i.e., working for people at their minister who fills another's pulpit. (For a consideration) is equally said to 'fog pouas.'"—St. James's Gazette, May 2, 1888.

whip, whippe, s. [WHIP, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. An instrument used for driving horses and other animals, or for correction; commonly consisting of a handle, a thong of plaited leather, and a lash of plaited hemp or other fibre. Frequently, however, the handle and thong are in one piece, forming a tapering flexible rod; riding-whips are made in this way.

"To thy speed add wings, Lest with a whip of scorpions I pursue Thy lightning."—Milton: P. L., II, 701.

2. A coachman, or driver of a carriage.

"None of the London whips . . . wear wig now."—Sheridan: Rivals, I, 1.

3. A whipper-in.

"The first whip was unlucky in meeting with a nasty accident some two or three weeks back."—Field, Oct. 15, 1887.

4. An endless line, used in saving life from a wreck.

"The whip passes rapidly toward the wreck, and arriving there the sailors make fast the tail-block in accordance with the directions on the tally-board, and show a signal to the shore."—Scribner's Magazine, Jan, 1889, p. 330.

5. A flag used for signalling.

6. The arm of a windmill, on which a sail is extended; also the length of the arm reckoned from the shaft.

II. Technically:

1. Naut.: A form of hoisting-tackle. A single whip is the most simple purchase in use. If the fall of the rope of a single whip be spliced round the block of another whip, it becomes whip on whip, or whip and runner. Thus two single blocks afford the same purchase as a tackle having a double and a single block, with much less friction.

2. Parliamentary (English):

(1) A member who performs the important duties of looking after the interests of his party, and who secures the attendance of as many members as possible at an important division.

"The Liberal whips have issued a somewhat similar invitation."—Pall Mall Gazette, Nov. 9, 1882.

(2) A call made upon the members of a party to attend in their places at a certain time, as when an important division is expected.

"Urgent whips have been issued by both sides."—Pall Mall Gazette, Nov. 9, 1882.

* ¶ Used as an exclamation = immediately

"You are no sooner chose in, but whip! you are as proud as the devil."—Centivore: Gotham Election.

¶ (1) The whip with six strings: [Six, ¶ (2)].

(2) Whip and derry:

Mixing: An arrangement for raising the kibble, by means of a rope merely passing over a pulley and attached to a horse.

(3) Whip and runner: [WHIP, s., II, 1, 1].

(4) Whip and spur: With the greatest haste. "Each staunch polemic Came whip and spur, and dash'd thro' thin and thick."—Pope: Dunciad, IV, 197.

whip-on-whip, s. [WHIP, s., II. 1.]

Whip-poor-Will, s.

Ornith.: Caprimulgus (Antrostomus) vociferus, a Goatsucker common in the eastern parts of the United States. It is about ten inches long; plumage tawny brown, much mottled and indistinctly marked with small transverse bands, top of the head streaked with black, and a narrow white collar on throat. The popular name of the bird is derived from the cry, which bears some resemblance to these words.

Nuttall (Ornithol. United States) says that "in the lower part of the state of Delaware he found these birds troublesome abundant in the breeding season, so that the reiterated echoes of 'whip-poor-will,' 'whip-peri-will,' issuing from several birds at the same time, occasioned such a confused vociferation as at first to banish sleep." The habits of the bird are like those of the European Goatsucker. [CAPRIMULGUS.]

whip-snake, s.

Zool.: Any species of the family Dryophide. They may be readily distinguished by their excessively slender back and tail, which has been compared to the thong of a whip, and long and narrow head, which ends in a protruding rostral shield or in a flexible snout. They are arboreal in habit, usually green in colour, and feed on birds and lizards. Wallace puts the genera at five and the species at fifteen, all from the tropical regions.

whip-socket, s. A pocket, usually on the edge of the dash-board, to hold the whip.

• whip-staff, s.

Naut.: A piece of wood fastened to the helm, which the steersman holds in his hand to move the helm and turn the ship. (Bailey.) whip-plîng, pr. par., a., & s. [WHIP, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As subst.: The act of punishing with a whip; the act of flogging; the punishment inflicted.

"Do not say him who deserves alone A whipping for the fault that he hath done."—Creech: Horace: Sat., III, 1.

¶ In mediæval times in England the punishment of whipping was inflicted on persons of low rank convicted of petty larceny and other small offences. By Act I George IV, c. 57, this punishment was abolished in the case of women. The Act 26 & 27 Vict., c. 44, extends whipping to males of any age convicted of robbery with violence, such as garroting. In the United States whipping does not exist as a punishment except in the State of Delaware, in which it is retained in the case of minor offences, such as larceny. In Europe the most frightful example of it was that formerly practiced in Russia, the whipping with the knout, in which the victim often died under the lash. It is now abolished. Whipping was formerly common in the army and navy, but has been replaced by milder punishments.

• whipping-boy, s. A boy formerly educated with a prince and punished in his stead. (Fuller: Church Hist., II, 382.)

• whipping-cheer, s. Flogging, flagellation, chastisement.

"She shall have whipping-cheer enough, I warrant her."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., v, 4.

2. Pottery: A throwing-table. [POTTER'S WHEEL.]

whirl-pool, * whirl-pole, * whirl-pool, s. [Eng. whirl, and pool.]

1. Ord. Lang. & Hydrology: A spot in a river or in the sea in which, through obstructions to flowing water, produced by banks, islands, rocks, or by winds or currents, a rotatory motion is imparted to the moving fluid. Revolutions of such a nature, on a minute scale, may be seen on nearly every streamlet; but the term whirlpool is used almost exclusively of the same phenomenon on a large scale. There is a tendency to vortical motion below most waterfalls. The Maelström, which obtained such celebrity, is in large measure mythic. A strong tidal current runs between the islands of Moskøe and Waae, where it exists, at one time from north to south, at another in the reverse direction. When the wind acts obliquely on the tidal current, a certain approach to vortical motion may be discerned, but there is no genuine whirl. It is the same with the classic whirlpool alleged to exist between Scylla and Charybdis. There is a tumult of waters in stormy weather, but nothing more. The whirlpool of Coryvrahan, or Corrievrahan, alluded to by Scott (Lord of the Isles, iv. 11) is situated between the north of Jura and the little island of Scarba in the Hebrides. The strong current which runs through the channel between the two islands encounters a pyramidal rock rising to within fifteen fathoms of the surface, and becoming deflected from the straight course, takes a circular form.

2. Zool.: A kind of whale; a whirl-whale.

"The ork whirl-pool, whole, or huffing physter." Sylvestre: Du Bartas, fifth day, first week.

whirl-wig, s. [Eng. whirl, and A.S. wiga, a kind of insect, a species of bug or beetle, &c.]

Entom.: Gyrinus natator. [GYRINUS.]

whirl-wind, * whyrle-wynde, s. [IceL. hvirlvindr; Dan. hvirvelvind; Sw. hvirvelvind.]

1. Lit. & Meteor.: A violent wind moving spirally, as if revolving round an axis, which has at the same time progressive motion. Whirlwinds are produced by two currents of air proceeding in different directions, and the course of the whirlwind is determined by the stronger of the two currents. Thus, supposing a whirlwind to arise from a north-wind blowing somewhat to the west of a south wind, when the latter currents come in contact if the north wind is the stronger, the direction of the whirl would be north, west, south, east; but the whirl-current will move in a contrary direction if the south wind be the stronger. Whirlwinds often originate in the tropics, especially in flat, sandy districts, during the hot season. The ground becoming unequally heated by the sun, gives rise to ascending columns of heated air, which result in whirl-currents drawing up large clouds of dust. [SIRMOOD.] The whirlwind seems to be a less violent form of the rotating storm known as the tornado (q.v.), the most destructive for its extent of all storms. Its principal seat is the central United States. [WATERBURY.]

"In this dire season, oft the whirling wing Sweeps up the burden of whole wintry plains At one wide waite." Thomson: Winter, 300.

2. Fig.: A violent rush.

"The deer was flying through the park, followed by the whirlwind of hounds and hunters." Macculay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxi.

* whirl-y-bát, s. [WHIRLBAT.]

"The Duchess . . . gabbles on whisperously."—Lytton: What will he do with it? bk. V., ch. viii.

whisk-sle, v. & s. [WHISTLE, v. & s.] whist, interj., a., & s. [A slight sound, expressive of the breathing or whispering of some one approaching; cf. Lat. st / = hiat; Ger. st / bst / pst / = hush, hush.]

* A. As interj.: Hush! silence! be still!

"Whist, wanton, still ye."—Lodge: Euphues: Golden Legacy.

* B. As adj.: Not speaking; not making a noise; mute, quiet, still. (Generally used as a predicate.)

"Underneath a hill Far from the town, (where all is whist and still),"—Murloze: Hero & Leander, sect. I.

C. As subst.: A game at cards, so called from the silence necessary to play it attentively and correctly. It was formerly also called whisk. It is played by four persons, two of whom are partners against the other two. The full pack of fifty-two cards is used, thirteen being dealt out to each player in order, the dealer beginning with himself, and dealing from left to right. The last card dealt is turned face up on the table, and is called the trump card; the suit to which it belongs has for the hand the privilege of taking or being superior to any card of any other suit. The cards rank in value as follows: ace (the highest), king, queen, knave, ten, nine, eight, and so on. The game is commenced by the player on the left hand of the dealer laying one card face upwards on the table, this being called leading off; the player on his left then plays a card of the same suit (if he has one), and is followed similarly by the player on his left. When all have played, the person who has played the highest card takes up the four cards played, these constituting what is termed a trick. If a player has no card of the suit led off, he may play one of any other suit. The winner of the first trick then leads off with any card he pleases for the second trick, the winner of which becomes the leader of the third trick, and so on. The score is taken as follows when the hand is played out: the partners who conjointly have won the majority out of the thirteen tricks, score one point for every trick over six. The ace, king, queen, and knave are called honours, and the partners who hold between them three of these cards score two points, and if they hold all of them they score four points; this is technically known as scoring two (or four) by honours. If each side holds two of these cards, honours are said to be divided. In long whist (now becoming obsolete) ten points make a game; in short whist only five points are required, and in this it is usual to count by tricks alone. A rubber consists of three games, and is won by the partners who score two of them. If one side wins the first two games the third is not played out. There are several modifications of the game, such as solo whist, three-handed whist, &c.

With rhyme by Hoare, and epic blank by Hoyle: Not him whose page, if still upheld by whist, Requires no sacred theme to bid us list.
Byron: English Bards & Scotch Reviewers.

*whist, v.t. & t. [WHIST, interj.]
A. Intrans.: To be or become silent, mute, or still.
"The whistled all." Surrey: Virgil: Aeneid II. 1.
B. Trans.: To make silent, mute, or still; to hush.

whis-tle (tlo as el), v.t. & t. [A.S. hwiſtlan, hwiſtlan; cogn. with Dan. hviſle = to whistle, to hiss; Sw. hviſsla = to whistle. A word of imitative origin, like whisper, whiz, &c.]
A. Intransitive:

1. To make a musical sound with the lips and breath without using the vocal cords; the hollow of the mouth forming a resonance-box.
"Have, thee, thy wish!"—he whistled shrill.
Scott: Lady of the Lake, v. 2.

2. To utter a mora or less shrill or piercing sound, or series of sounds, as a bird.
"The blackbird whistles from the thorny brake."
Thomson: Spring, 304.

3. To produce a sound or sounds by means of a particular kind of wind instrument (or whistle) or by means of steam forced through a small orifice.

4. To sound shrill or like a pipe.
"The wild winds whistle, and the billows roar."
Pope: Homer; Odyssey VII. 287.

5. To cause a sharp, shrill sound.
"A bullet whistled o'er his head."
Byron: The Giaour.

B. Transitive:
1. To form, utter, or modulate by whistling.
2. To call, direct, or signal by a whistle.
"Be cast off his friends, as a huntsman his pack, For he knew, when he pleased, he could whistle them back."
Goldsmith: Retaliation, 107.

¶ (1) To go whistle: To go to the deuce.
"Your fame is secure, let the critics go whistle."
Sherston: Post & Beam.

(2) To whistle for a wind: A superstitious practice amongst old sailors of whistling during a calm to obtain a breeze. Such men, on the contrary, will not whistle during a storm.

(3) To whistle off:
Falconry: To send off by a whistle; to send from the fist in search of prey; hence, to dismiss or send away generally; to dismiss. Hawks were always let fly against the wind; if they flew with the wind behind them they seldom returned. If, therefore, a hawk was for any reason to be dismissed or abandoned she was let off down the wind.

"If I could prove her haggard, Though that her jesses were my dear hearstirring, I'd whistle her off, and let her down the wind, To prey at fortune."
Shakspeare: Othello, III. 1.

whis-tle (tlo as el), s. [WHISTLE, v.]
1. A more or less piercing sound produced by forcing the breath through a small opening formed by contracting the lips.

2. Any similar sound: as—
(1) The sharp or shrill note of a bird.

Zool.: Amphibæna alba, eighteen to twenty inches long, and about as thick as a man's finger. [AMPHIBENIDE.]

white-antimony, s. [VALENTINITE.]

white-ants, s. pl.
Entom.: A popular name for any of the Termitidae (q. v.). The resemblance to the ants, Formicidae, &c., is in the general aspect, their life in social communities, the appearance at certain times of many winged individuals, and the nature of the habitations. But they belong to different orders, the venation of the wings being different. A white ant looks not unlike a soft immature earwig, but without the forceps. White ants constitute the most destructive insect pest to be found in the tropics. They do not attack human beings, their ravages being confined to property. They make their way into houses through some minute aperture which they have found or have themselves formed in the floor or in the wall. Nothing external may reveal the fact that the joists or rafters on which they have been operating are weakened and rendered unsafe by being all pierced internally with their galleries. If they can effect an entrance into a library they bring up mud and construct tunnels with it so as to glue one block to another, and eat away the leather or cloth by which the boards were affixed to the book itself, besides rounding off the angles of a number of the volumes. Whatever is in danger of them is placed on a table or frame, the legs of which rest on stone stands, surrounded by water. Every historical document in India is in danger from these destructive creatures. Prof. Drummond suggests that white ants probably render the same service in the tropics which earthworms do in temperate lands. The workers and soldiers of the white ants are blind, and rarely appear above ground, making their migrations from place to place under mud tunnels, which they construct as they advance. The workers have large broad heads and strong jaws adapted for gnawing; the soldiers have still larger heads and longer jaws. These wingless forms resemble the true ants in appearance, but the winged male and female forms are much larger and flatter. The latter possess eyes, and leave the nest in great flying swarms in the pairing season, few of them escaping the ravages of their enemies during this period. The "out hills" erected by them are wonderful in character, those of Termites bellicosus, of West Africa, being huge sugar-loaf shaped mounds of earth, from ten to twenty feet high, and so strongly cemented as to bear a man's weight. Internally they present several stories and many chambers, some for the workers and soldiers, one for the king and queen, and others for the eggs and young, and for food supplies. One species is common in the United States, T. flavipes; it is fortunately not specially destructive. The female or queen of the termites undergoes remarkable changes, increasing in size till from two to five inches in length, and becoming enormously distended with eggs, which it may lay at the rate of 80,000 a day.

white-light, s.

Optics: The apparently simple sensation which is nevertheless really produced on the retina by a certain mixture of colours. Ordinarily white light is composed of the whole of the visible colours of the spectrum, as in sunlight; and the fact of white resulting from this mixture can be demonstrated in many ways, as by re-uniting the spectral colours themselves, or by revolving rapidly a disc [Newton's disc] painted with the colours in separate sectors. A similar mixture of pigments fails, partly because the pigments themselves are never pure colours, and partly and chiefly because pigments act rather as absorbents of the light reflected from the paper or other colours underneath than as additional illuminating colours. White light can, however, be also compounded of three, or of only two colours, which are then called complementary colours. Such white is quite undistinguishable by the eye from white compounded of all the colours; and hence it follows that the eye is not an ultimate appeal in such matters, but is easily deceived by apparently similar total results really compounded of quite different materials. The same applies to colours, which can also be imitated so far as the eye can judge, but analysis by the prism reveals the different composition of the light instantly.

Bot.: (1) Quercus pedunculata; (2) Q. alba; (3) In New South Wales, Casuarina leptocladia.

¶ Q. alba, the White Oak of the United States, is a tree of lending economic importance, its wood being largely used in ship and house building, in the making of wheels, wagons, and casks, and for many other purposes. It is abundant throughout the eastern section of the country, extending far into Canada on the north, and to the Gulf of Mexico on the south. In aspect it resembles Q. robur, the European oak, forming a thick trunk with spreading base, and extending huge spreading boughs when in open spaces.

Its name is derived from the whitish color of its bark. In favorable situations it often attains a great size. Trunks of three or four feet diameter are not infrequent, and much larger ones are sometimes found. The wood is strong and hard in texture, but variable in quality, and less durable than that of the best British oaks.

White Penitents, s. pl.

Church Hist.: The White Brethren (q.v.).

white-pepper, s. [PEPPER, s., 2.]white-pine, s.

Botany & Commercial:

1. Pinus strobus: Of the lumber yielding trees of the United States the White Pine stands first, being important for its large growth and abundance, and for the soft even grain of its wood, which renders it one of the most easily worked trees for carpentry purposes. No other tree of this country is used so abundantly in the building and other common wood-working arts. This tree abounds from Canada to the Gulf States, but in the Eastern States has been so destroyed by the lumbermen that the former great forests of it have largely disappeared. At one time Maine and Vermont were celebrated for the size of their white pines, but few of these great trees now exist in New England, while the vast forests formerly existing in the mountains of Pennsylvania have been greatly depleted. Within recent years Michigan has been the chief source of white pine lumber, but the immense forests of that state and of Wisconsin are rapidly vanishing before the lumberman's destructive axe. It is estimated that the once seemingly inexhaustible stores can last but a few years more at the present rate of indiscriminate destruction. There are large forests still in Canada. The White Pine belongs to the group with five leaves in each tuft. It is often a tree of noble proportions, attaining, in a deep, rich soil, a height of 150 or even 200 feet, the trunks sometimes 80 or 90 feet high without a branch. This renders them valuable for masts. Trunks have been measured from six to nearly eight feet in diameter. The wood of the White Pine is durable for indoor use, particularly when protected by paint, but rapidly decays when exposed to moist air. It is very liable to dry rot. It has been introduced into England, where it is known as Weymouth Pine. It grows well in Germany.

white'-bait, s. [Eng. white, and bait.]

Ichthyology:

1. A small fish to which specific and, by some authorities, generic distinction has been given; in the first case as Clupea alba, in the second as Rogenia alba, now known to be the fry of the herring (Clupea harengus). White-bait are caught chiefly in the estuary of the Thames, and are not uncommon in the Firth of Forth. The fishery begins in April and lasts till September, bag-nets sunk four or five feet below the water being employed. The whitebait brought to market are from three to four inches long, pale ashy-green above, silvery-white beneath. They are of exquisite flavor, and favorites among English epicures. They are not known under this name elsewhere. The herring-fry thus caught ranges from two to six or nine months old. The fry of the sprat is also taken, and sometimes that of the shad, these occurring in abundance at the mouths of rivers and in estuaries where the adults are numerous.

2. A local name for Salanx chinensis, called also Japanese Whitebait. [SALANX.]

white'-boy, s. [Etym. in sense 1., doubtful; in sense 2., see extract.]

whit-löw, s. [A corruption of quick-flaw, i.e., a flaw or flaking off of the skin in the neighbourhood of the quick, or sensitive part of the finger round the nail. The form whit-flaw (= quick-flaw) is still used in the North of England, and whitflaw and whitstone are old forms.]
Surg.: Inflammation arising in the phalanges of the fingers, or more rarely of the toes, and generally advancing to suppuration. Its seat may be in the skin, in the tendons, in the periosteum, or in the cellular tissue under the nail, or may affect the bone. The deeper it is seated the more troublesome and even dangerous it is. It may arise spontaneously or be caused by the prick of a needle, a pin, or a thorn, and a burning, shooting pain and swelling arise. In aggravated cases the inflammation extends up the arm, and sometimes carries of the bone takes place. As a rule a whitlow requires surgical treatment, for which it is inconveniently situated when it occurs under the nail. (ONYCHIA, PARONYCHIA.)

(masc.), pl. hverir; Dan. Avo = who; hvad = what; hvis = whose; hvem = whom (dat. & accus.); Sw. hvem = who, whom; hvad = what; hvem, heers = whose; Ger. wer = who; was = what; wessen, wess = whose; wem = to whom; wen = whom (accus.); Goth. nom. hwas, hwo, hwa (or hwaota), genit. hwis, hwasos, hwas, dat. hwasamma, hwasiz, hwasamma, accus. hwasna, hwo, hwa (or hwaota), instrumental hwe, pl. hwa, &c.; Ir. & Gael. eo; Wel. pwy; Lat. quis, quæ, quid; Rnas. kto, chto = who, what; Lith. kas = who; Sañsc. kas = who; Kim = what; kam = whom. "Formerly who, what, which were not relative but interrogative pronouns; which, whose, whom occur as relatives as early as the end of the twelfth century, but who not until the fourteenth century, and was not in common use before the sixteenth century." (Morris: Hist. Outlines of Eng. Accidence, § 188.) In genuine idiomatic Scotch who, or who (including also the possessive and objective), is still only an interrogative, that, or 'at, being the relative.] A relative and interrogative pronoun, always used substantively (that is, not joined to a noun), and referring to one or more persons. It is uninflected for number, but has whose for its possessive, and whom for the objective.

1. As an interrogative pronoun = what person or persons?

"Who hath weel? who hath sorrow? who hath out-tentons?"—Proverbs xxiii. 29.

2. As a relative pronoun = that.

"Happy the man, and happy he alone, He who can call to-day his own."—Dryden: Hist. Horace, bk. III, ode 29.

3. Used elliptically = he (or they) who.

"Who steals my purse steals trash."—Shakesp.: Othello, III, 3.

4. Whoever.

"Let it be who it is."—Shakesp.: Julius Caesar, I, 1.

† Who is used as a relative referring to persons, which to things, and that to either indifferently. Who and which are used in two ways:

(1) To connect two co-ordinate sentences: as, I met a man who told me; I read the book which pleased me. Each of these sentences could be turned into two propositions; as, I met a man and he told me; I read the book and it pleased me. (2) To introduce subordinate or adjectival clauses: as, The book which you are reading; the man who told me. In these cases who and which cannot be turned into and he or and it.

† As who should say: As if one should say; as one who said.

"Hope throws a generous contempt upon ill usage, and looks like a handsome defiance of a misfortune; as who should say, you are somewhat troublesome now, but I shall conquer you."—Collier: Against Despair.

whöa, exclam. [From the sound uttered.] Stop! stand still!

*whö-büb, s. [WHOOBUB.]

*whode, s. [HOOD.] A hood.

"A foxes toyle for a septure, and a whode with two eares."—Bale: English Voyages, p. 104.

whö-öw-ër (w silent), pron. [Eng. who, and ever.] Anyone without exception who; no matter who; any person whatever.

"Whoever doth to temperance apply His steadfast life."—Spenser: F. Q., II, v. 1.

whole (w silent), *hol, *hole, *wholl, *wholle, a. & s. [Properly spelt hole, the original sense being hale or sound. The spelling hole continued in use to the beginning of the sixteenth century. For the prefixed w cf. whol = hot (Spenser: F. Q., II, i. 58); where = hore; whole = hood, &c. A.S. hól = whole; cogn. with Dut. heel; Icel. heill; Dan. heel; Sw. hel; Ger. heil; Goth. hails; Gr. kalós (kalos) = excellent, good, hale; Sañsc. kalpa = healthy, hale. If hole and hale are doublets, the latter being from the Icel. heill.]

2. Unimpaired, uninjured.

"My life is yet whole in me."—2 Samuel I, 6.

3. Not broken, not fractured, intact: as, The plate is still whole.

4. Complete, entire; not defective or imperfect; having all its parts.

"Hest any more of this?" "The whole butt, man."—Shakesp.: Tempest, II, 2.

5. Containing the total number or amount; comprising all the parts, units, divisions, &c.

that make up an aggregate total; all the. (Generally preceded by the.)

"Where armies whole have sunk." Milton: P. L., li. 594.

B. As substantive:

1. An entire thing; a thing complete in all its parts, units, &c.; a thing complete in itself; the entire or total assemblage of parts; all of a thing, without deduction, defect, or exception; the entirety.

"Love, that of every woman's heart Will have the whole, and not a part." Longfellow: Golden Legend, iv.

2. A complete system; a complete and regular combination of parts.

"All are but parts of one stupendous whole, Whose body Nature is, and God the soul." Pope: Essay on Man, i. 287.

¶ Whole excludes subtraction; entire excludes division; complete excludes deficiency: a whole orange has nothing taken from it; an entire orange is not yet cut; and a complete orange is grown to its full size; it is possible, therefore, for a thing to be whole and not entire; and to be both, and yet not complete: an orange cut into parts is whole while all the parts remain together, but it is not entire: hence we speak of a whole house, an entire set, and a complete book. The wholeness or integrity of a thing is destroyed at one's pleasure; the completeness depends upon circumstances. (Crabb.)

* ¶ (1) By whole sale; By the whole: Wholesale.

Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1878), I, 461.

widow-duck, s.

Ornith.: Dendrocygna viduata, ranging from South America to Africa. Length about eighteen inches; face and throat white; back of head, nape, and sides of neck bright reddish-brown; sides of breast and back reddish-olive, darkly spotted and marked; lower back, centre of tail, and under side below the breast black; sides grayish-white, striped with dark brown; upper wing-coverts reddish-brown, secondary quills olive-brown with green edges; quills and tail-feathers greenish-black. According to Schomburgk (Reisen, I, 407, iii. 762), the natives of British Guiana call this bird Vis-sta-si, from its cry. (Viciusy-nuck.)

widow-hunter, s. One who seeks or courts widows for their fortunes.

"The widow-hunters about town often afford them great diversion."
Addison.

* widow-maker, s. One who makes widows by bereaving women of their husbands.

"That I must draw this metal from my side.
To be a widow-maker."
Shakespeare: King John, v. 2.

widow-monkey, s.

Zool.: Callithrix lugens, from South America. It has been compared to a diminutive black dog with a white face; the neck and fore limbs are also white, and this disposition of colour has given rise to the popular name bestowed on the animal by the Creoles, who see in the whiteness of the face, neck, and arms some resemblance to the veil, handkerchief, and gloves worn by widows of their own race.

widow-sacrifice, s.

Anthrop.: A form of funeral-sacrifice in which the widow was slain or induced to commit suicide so that she might be buried with her husband and accompany him to the world of spirits. This practice is mentioned as existing among the Greeks by Euripides (Suppl., 983) and Pausanias (iv. 2), and from Cæsar (de Bello Gall., vi. 19) it may be inferred that it existed also in Gaul. Widow-sacrifice is still the custom in many African tribes; traces of it may be found in China; it lingered till late in the first half of the nineteenth century in Fiji, and, though abolished by law in British India in 1829, is not yet abandoned. (SUTTEE, I.)

"Widow-sacrifice is found in various regions of the world under a low state of civilization, and this fits with the hypothesis of its having belonged to the Aryans while yet in an early and barbarous condition." Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1878), I, 467.

widow-wail, s.

Bot.: (1) The genus Cneorum, and especially Cneorum tricoccos; † (2) Fritillaria Meleagris.

widow's terrace, s. [TERCE, 4.]

wid-ow (2), s. [See compound.]

widow-bird, s.

Ornith.: The Whidah-bird (q.v.).
"The name Widow-bird is altogether an erroneous title, although it is supposed by many persons to have been given to the bird on account of its dark colour and long train, as well as in consequence of its evidently disconsolate state when the beautiful tail-feathers have fallen off after the breeding season... In point of fact, however, the proper name is Whidah-bird, a title that was originally given to it by the Portuguese, because the first specimens that were brought to Europe came from the Kingdom of Whidah, on the eastern coast of Africa."
Wood: Itin. Nat. Hist., II, 457.

wid-ow, v. t. [Widow (1), s.]

† 2. Fig. (Pl.): A term applied to the recruits for the Irish Brigade in the service of France in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

"The wild-geese are coming at length o'er the sea And Eirino, green Eirino once more shall be free."
—M. J. Barry: The Wildgeese (Spirit of the Nation).

Wild-goose chase: The pursuit of anything in ignorance of the course it will take; hence, a foolish pursuit or enterprise. According to Dyce, a wild-goose chase was a kind of horse-race, in which two horses were started together, and whichever rider could get the lead, the other was obliged to follow him over whatever ground he chose to go.

"If our wilds run the wild-goose chase, I have done; for thou hast more of the wild-goose in one of thy wits, than I have in my whole five."—Shakesp.: Romeo & Juliet, II. 4.

wild-honey, s. Honey made by wild bees, that is by bees not kept by man.

wild-horse, s.
Zool.: Any undomesticated individual of the species Equus caballus. According to Darwin, no aboriginal or truly wild horse is known, and the herds of so-called wild horses in Asia are probably, as those in America and Australia are certainly, descended from ancestors which escaped from the control of man.

wild-hunt, s. [WILD-HUNTSMAN.]

wild-huntsman, s.
Anthrop.: The principal figure in an Aryan storm-myth, in which the phenomena of a tempest are represented as incidents in a hunt or chase. (The legend was popularized by Scott in his Wild Huntsman, an imitation of Bürger's Wilde Jäger.)

"The peasant who keeps up in Areside talk the memory of the Wild Huntsman, Wodejager, the Grand Veneur of Fontainebleau, Herne the butler of Windsor Forest, has almost lost the significance of this grand old storm-myth. By mere force of tradition, the name of the 'Wish' or 'Wush' hounds of the Wild Huntsman has been preserved through the west of England; the words must for ages past have lost their meaning among the country-folk, though we may plainly recognise in them Woden's ancient well-known name, old German 'Wunsch.' As of old, the Heaven-god drives the clouds before him in raging tempest across the sky, while, safe within the cottage walls the tale-teller unwittingly describes, in personal legendary shape, his same Wild Hunt of the Storm."
—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), II. 362.

Bot.: Scilla nutans. [HYACINTH, I. 2.]

- 6. That which is strongly desired or wished for; as, He had his will.

II. Technically:

1. Law: The legal declaration of a man's intentions as to the disposal of his property after his death; a testament. In England, no will is valid unless it be in writing and signed at the foot or end by the testator, or by some person in his presence and by his direction. Such signature must further be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more persons who in his presence, and in the presence of each other, must sign their names as witnesses. An exception is made in the case of soldiers on active service and mariners, who have power to make nuncupative wills. [NUNCUPATIVE.] In Scotland, formerly only personal property could be disposed of by will, real property being conveyed by a disposition or deed in which the testator's life-rent in the subject was reserved; but heritable property can now be so disposed of. The law of the United States agrees substantially with that of England.

"The statute 1 Vict., c. 36, having repealed the act of Geo. II., re-enacts and extends some of its provisions. It avoids bequests, not only to an attesting witness, but to the husband or wife of such witness; and expressly provides that the incompetency of a witness to prove the execution of a will, shall not render it void. It further enacts that any creditor, or the wife or husband of any creditor, whose debts charged upon the property devised or bequeathed by the will, may be admitted to prove the execution thereof as an attesting witness; and that an executor of a will may be admitted to prove its execution, a point on which some doubts had previously existed."—Blackstone's Comment., II. II, ch. 24.

2. Philosophy:

(1) Though the word will has often been used, as it popularly is, in two senses—the power of the mind which enables a person to choose between two courses of action, and the actual exercise of that power—strict reasoners separate these meanings, calling the former wilful and the latter volition. Will in this limited sense is that mental power or faculty by which, of two or more objects of desire or courses of action presented to it, it chooses one, rejecting the other or others. To what extent this power of selection is arbitrary, or is the result of necessity, has been for ages a subject of controversy. [FREE-WILL.] The division of the mental powers which came down from antiquity, and was most generally adopted by philosophers, was into the powers belonging to the understanding, and those belonging to the will. Reid adopted it, though considering it not quite logical. "Under the will," he says, "we comprehend our active powers, and all that lead to action or influence the mind to act, such as appetites, passions, affections." (Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man, essay 1, ch. II., § 1, 2.) Brown denounced this classification as very illogical, considering that the will was not in any way opposed to the intellect, but exercised in the intellectual department an empire almost as wide as in that which was allotted to itself. "We reason," he says, "and plan and invent, at least as voluntarily as we esteem or hate, or hope or fear." (Philosophy of the Human Mind, sect. xv.). The term Active Powers used by Reid is a synonym for the will.

which manifest themselves in inorganic nature. As intermediate between the one universal Will and the individuals in which it appears, he posits, following the example of Plato, various ideas, which are the stages of the objectification of will. His ethical requirements are sympathy with the suffering which is connected with all objectifications of the will to live, and the mortification, not of life, but rather of the will to live, through asceticism. The world, in his system, is the worst of all possible worlds; sympathy alleviates suffering, while asceticism destroys it by destroying the will to live, in the midst of life. In its negation of the sensuous nature in man, without positive determination of the true end of a spiritual life, Schopenhauer's teaching resembles the Buddhist doctrine of Nirvana. (Ueberweg.)

¶ (1) At will: At pleasure; as, To hold an estate or office at will, i. e., to enjoy the possession during the pleasure of another, and to be liable to be ousted at any time by him.

- (2) Good-will: [GOONWILL.]
- (3) To have one's will: To obtain what one desires; to be able to act as one wishes.
- (4) To work one's will: To act absolutely according to one's will; wish, pleasure, or discretion; to do or be able to do exactly as one fancies.
- (5) With a will: With willingness, pleasure, and zeal; with all one's heart; heartily.

- * will-less, a. Involuntary. "John blind duty and will-less resignation."—Blackston; Clarissa, I. 90.
- * will-worship, a. Worship according to one's own fancy; worship imposed merely by human will, not on divine authority; supererogatory worship. "Which things have indeed a show of wisdom in will-worship."—Col. II. 23.
- * will-worshipper, a. One who practices will-worship. "He that says, God is rightly worshipped by an act or ceremony concerning which himself hath no way expressed his pleasure, is superstitious or a will-worshipper."—Bp. Taylor; Rule of Conscience, bk. II, ch. III.

1. A word denoting either simple futurity or futurity combined with volition, according to the subject of the verb.

"I am your wife, if you will marry me."
Shakep.: Tempest, III. 1.

(1) In the first person singular and plural, I (we) will, the verb denotes willingness, consent, intention, determination, or fixed purpose, thus differing from shall, which in the first person denotes simple futurity: as, I will go, if you wish it, I will speak, if I please. (2) In the second and third persons, will denotes simple futurity or certainty, the idea of volition, purpose, or wish being lost: as, He will certainly come.

2. Would stands in the same relation to will as should to shall, and is mainly employed in subjunctive, conditional, or optative senses, in the last case having often the functions and force of an independent verb: as,

(1) Subjunctive or conditional:

"Backward she thrust him as she would be thrust."
Shakep.: Venus & Adonis, 41.

(2) Optative:

"I would my valiant master would destroy thee."
Shakep.: Tempest, III. 2.

(3) Also used, by omission of the pronoun, as an exclamation of wish, prayer, or desire.

"Would to God we had died to Egypt."—Ezodius xvi. 3.

¶ In such sentences as, It would seem, It would appear, &c., would retains almost nothing of conditionality, having merely the effect of softening a direct statement. Would sometimes is used to express a habit or custom: as, He would read all day. In such sentences as, He would go, and you see the result, would has nearly the force of a simple past indicative, but is more emphatic. Will and would were formerly used elliptically with adverbs and prepositional phrases to express motion or change of place, where we should now say will go, would go, or the like.

"I'll never to sea again."
Shakep.: Merry Wives, II. 1.

A similar elliptical use occurs in such phrases as: What would you? = What would you have, do, or wish?

will-lōck, s. [See extract.]

Ornith.: The young of Uria troile, the Common Guillemot.

"The cry of the young Guillemot is willock, willock, whence its local name, and the same is probably the origin of the French derived Guillemot for the adult; a term seldom employed by the fishermen and cliff-men, excepting when speaking to strangers."—Forsell: Brit. Birds (ed. 4th), IV. 72.

will-lōugh-bō-ā (gh silent), s. [WILLOUGH-BEIA.]

will-lōw, * wil-ow, * wilwe, s. [A.S. welig; cogn. with O. Dut. wilge; Dut. wilg; Low Ger. wilge. From the same root as walk, welkin, and withy.]

1. Ordinary language:

1. Lit. & Bot.: Any species of the genus Salix (q.v.). Used also in a more limited sense for any Salix which is not known as an osier or a willow. [OSIER, SALLOW.] Some of the willows in the limited sense furnish good timber. The Bedford willow, Salix Russelliana, a variety of S. fragilis, the Crack Willow or Withy, is a tree sometimes attaining fifty feet in height, and twelve in girth. It was first brought into notice by the Duke of Bedford, whence its name, and is very valuable for its timber, the bark containing much tannin, and a larger amount of salicine (q.v.) than any other of the genus. Another valuable timber tree is S. alba, the Huntingdon or White Willow. It is eighty feet high, with a girth of twenty feet. The timber is used for carpentry and for fuel, and the bark for tanning. The two species named have been introduced into the United States, where they are wide-spread and, with S. babylonica, the Weeping Willow, form our largest willows. There are a number of species native to this country, most of them shrubs or small trees, some minute plants. [SALIX.]

2. Figuratively:

* (1) Mourning.

"We see your willow and are sorry for't. And though it be a wedding we are half mourners."
Beaumont & Fletcher: Night Walker, I.

(2) In cricketering slang, the bat, so called from the material of which it is made.

II. Technically:

1. Weaving: A machine for cleaning cotton, wool, or hemp; a devil. [DEVIL, s., II., 3. (1).]

"The term willow is said to have been derived from the fact that in the early forms of the machine a cylindrical willow cage was used. It is more than probable that the term is derived from the willow-wands where-with the cotton was beaten, to loosen it and eject the impurities, before the invention of machinery for the purpose."—Knight: Dict. Mechanics.

2. Script.: Probably the Oleander (q.v.).

* ¶ To wear the willow: To assume mourning or grieve for a lost lover.

willow-fly, s.

Entom.: (1) Chloroperla viridis; (2) Nemura variegata. [PELIDÆ.]

willow-gall, s.

Veg. Pathol.: A gall produced on willows by the puncture of a dipterous insect, Cecidomyia strobilina, in the leaf buds, which causes arrest of growth so that the stem scarcely develops, and the leaves are crowded together into a close rosette. (Thom.) willow-ground, s. A piece of marshy ground in which osiers are cultivated; an osier bed.

Entom.: Lagopus albus, from the northern portions of both hemispheres. It resembles the Ptarmigan in plumage, and like that species, becomes white in winter. Called also White Grouse and White Ptarmigan.

"With us there is no reason why it should assume the white winter plumage like its congeners; and yet there can be no question that our bird is the local representative of the white willow-grouse which ranges over the whole of Northern Europe."—St. James's Gazette, Jan 6, 1887.

willow-herb, s.

Botany:

1. The genus Epilobium and specially E. angustifolium; called more fully the Rose-bay willow herb, or simply the Rose-bay. It is a tall underbrush, four to six feet high, with scattered lanceolate, or linear lanceolate, veined, glabrous, willow-like leaves, three to six inches long, (whence its name), irregular, rose-purple flowers an inch in diameter. It is found by moist river-sides and copses, chiefly in Scotland, also on the continent of Europe, in temperate Asia, and North America. Ale and vinegar are made in Kamtschatka from the fermentation of the pith dried and boiled; the young leaves are sometimes eaten, the mature ones are narcotic. From the scent of its flowers the plant is sometimes called Apple Pie.

2. Lysimachia vulgaris.

Ornith.: The Sedge-warbler. (Pennant: Brit. Zool., ed. 1768, II. 241.)

willow-leaves, s. pl.

Astron.: Another name for Rice-grains (q.v.). [SUS.]

willow-moth, s.

Entom.: Caradrina cubicularis, a common British Night-moth, called by Newman the Pale Mottled Willow Moth. Fore wings ochre gray, with two dark spots on the costa; hind wings white, with a dark brown line on the posterior margin. The caterpillar, which is small at harvest time, becomes hunched with the grain, the peas, &c., and doing immense damage. It changes to a chrysalis in May.

willow-oak, s.

Bot.: Quercus Phellos. Leaves smooth, membranous, linear, lanceolate, pointed, entire; acorn roundish. A large tree with strong coarse timber, growing in swampy willow-warbler, s. [WILLOW-WREN.]

willow-weed, s.

Bot.: (1) Lythrum Salicaria; (2) various species of Polygonum, specially P. lapathifolium.

willow-wren, willow-warbler, s.

Ornith.: Phylloscopus (Sylvia) trochilus; called also the Willow-warbler, and Yellow-wren, from the localities it frequents and the general colour of its plumage. Length about five inches; dull olive-green on the upper part of the body; chin, throat, and breast yellowish white; abdomen nearly pure white. The Willow-wren generally arrives in England about the middle of April, and soon after begins to couple. The nest is placed on the ground, most commonly against a bank amongst long grass or weeds, but often at the foot of a bush, and, like that of the Wood-wren, is covered with a dome having a rather wide hole in the side, whence this species and its congeners are called in many parts of the country "Oven-birds." The willow-wren is a graceful, active bird, fitting restlessly from twig to twig, and the song is loud and sweet.

winc'-cey, s. [Probably a corruption of linsey-woolsey, the successive steps being linsey-wincey, then wincey or wincey alone.]

Fabric: A strong and durable cloth, plain or twilled, composed of a cotton warp and a woollen weft. It is much worn by women as skirtings and petticoats, and a lighter class is used for men's shirts.

winch (1), *winche, *wynche, s. [A.S. wince; cf. M. H. Ger. wenke = a bending or crooking.]

1. The crank, projecting handle, or lever by which the axis of a revolving machine is turned, as in the windlass, grindstone, &c.
2. A reel on a fishing-rod.

3. The most simple form of hoisting-machine, consisting of a roller on which the rope is wound, the turning-power being a crank. It has many modifications in respect of its adaptation to cranes and derricks. Increased power is obtained by placing a large spur-wheel on the roller-shaft and turning it by a pinion on the crank-shaft. When on a movable frame, with drum and gearing, and adapted for hauling in the fall of the hoisting-tackle of derricks, &c., it is called a crab (q.v.).

winch (2), s. [A corruption of wince (1), a.] A kick, as from impatience or fretfulness, as of a horse; a twist or turn.

* The mule . . . within two or three winches overthrew him.—Shelton: Don Quixote, pt. II, ch. i.

winch, v.t. [WINCH (2), s.] To kick with impatience; to shrink, to wince.

Win'-chës-tër (1), s. [See def.]
1. Geog.: The name of the capital city of Hampshire, England.
* 2. A Winchester pint, i.e., a quart.

* Sear'd Winchester of three-peuny guzle.—T. Brown: Words, II. 180.

* Winchester-bushel, s. A dry measure used in England from the time of Henry VII. to the year 1836, when the imperial bushel was made the standard measure. It contained 2150.42 cubic inches.

* Winchester-gosse, s. A cant term for a venereal sore, said to have originated from the public stews in Southwark being under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Winchester. (Shakesp.: 1 Henry VI., i. 3.)

Winchester-measure, s. The same as WINCHESTER-BUSHEL (q.v.).

Win'-chës-tër (2), s. [See def. and compound.] The name of the inventor.

Winchester-rifle, Winchester repeating-rifle, s.

Fire-arms: A magazine-rifle the reserve chamber of which contains seventeen cartridges, which can be discharged in as many seconds.

winc'-ing, a. [Eng. wince (3), s.; -ing.] [See compound.]

wincing-machine, s. [WINCE (3), s.]

* win'-cô-pipe, s. [WINK-A-PEEP.]

wind (in poetry often wînd) (1), *winde, *wynd, *wynde, s. [A.S. wînd; cogn. with Dut. wînd; Icel. windr; Dan. & Sw. wînd; O. H. Ger. wînt; Goth. wînds, wînthis; Ger. wînd; Lat. ventus; Welsh gwynl; from the Sansc. root vā = to blow.]

I. Ordinary Language:
1. In the same sense as II.
2. A direction from which the wind may blow; a point of the compass, especially one of the cardinal points.

* Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain.—Ezekiel xxxvii. 9.
3. Air artificially set in motion from any force or action.

* With the whiff and wind of his fell sword.
Shakesp.: Othello, III. 3.

4. The lungs or organs of breathing.

* Blow till thou burst thy wind.—Shakesp.: Tempest, I. 1.

5. Power of respiration; lung-power; breath.

* Is not your voice broken? your wind short?—Shakesp.: 2 Henry IV., I. 2.

* 6. Breath modulated by the respiratory organs or by an instrument.

* Their instruments were various in their kind; Some for the bow, and some for breathing wînd.
Dryden: Flower & Leaf, 457.

7. Air impregnated with animal odour or scent.

* To save his life he leapt into the main, But there, alas! he could no safety find: A pack of dog-fish had him in the wind.
Swift. (Todd.)

8. Air or gas generated in the stomach or bowels; flatulence.

9. A disease of sheep in which the intestines are distended with air, or rather affected with a violent inflammation. It occurs immediately after shearing.

10. That part of the body in the neighbourhood of the stomach, a blow on which causes temporary inability to breathe. (Slang.)

11. Anything light or insignificant as wind such as empty or idle words, idle threats, unmeaning talk, or the like.

* Stop in your wind.

Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, I. 2.

* 12. A sigh.

* Storming her world with sorrow's wind and rain.
Shakesp.: Complaint of a Lover, 7.

II. Meteor.: A current of air moving in the atmosphere in any direction or with any velocity. Winds are produced by variations of temperature in different latitudes, or at different portions of the same latitude. Heated air tends to ascend, and, to prevent a void from arising in the lower portion of the atmosphere from which it has ascended, a current of air colder, and therefore denser, takes its place. This phenomenon is most obvious in the tropics, from which hot rarefied air is ever ascending, one part towards the Northern, and the other towards the Southern Pole. From these two regions, cold currents of air proceed near the surface of the ground or the ocean to supply the threatened void. Were the earth at rest, the hot currents would depart from, and the cold currents strike the equator at right angles, but owing to the rotation of the earth from west to east, more quickly than its friction can carry the atmosphere with it, the latter is somewhat deflected to the westward, the hot current leaving and the cold one striking the equatorial line at an oblique instead of a right angle. As the circles to be traversed by the rotating sphere or spheroid vary in magnitude in every latitude, cyclones tend to be generated which rotate in one direction, when they arise to the north, and in another when they are generated south of the equator. [CYCLONE.] The heat of the vertical or nearly vertical sun rarefies the atmosphere in the tropics over both land and water, not, however, to the same extent. Land is easily heated during the day and cooled during the night. Water is less easily changed in temperature, hence every tropical island is like a separate furnace, at work during the day rarefying the air and sending it upwards, whilst, falling below the temperature of the ocean during the night, it modifies, suspends, or reverses the process, especially if the absence of clouds make radiation great. Hence, land and sea breezes arise; the former blowing during the day from the sea to the land, the latter during the night in a contrary direction. Next, every high mountain is a refrigerating apparatus, capable of sending down its slope cooled air on all its sides, and consequently from every point of the compass. Even apart from these local complications, the higher the heated air which ascends from the tropics rises, the colder the atmospheric region into which it enters; it therefore ultimately parts with the caloric which enabled it to ascend, and begins to fall, while the cold polar currents blowing towards the equator become heated, especially where their course is over the land, and ascend. Observation shows that in consequence of these causes, there are eight principal directions in which winds blow: from the north, the north-east, the east, the south-east, the south, the south-west, the west and the north-west. A north wind is one which blows from the north, not one blowing to that region, and so with the others. Classified according to the direction in which they blow, winds are divided into Regular, Periodical, and Variable Winds. The first are winds which blow all the year round in the same direction, as the Trade winds; the second those which blow regularly at the same seasons and the same hours of the day, as the monsoons, the land and sea breezes, and the simoom; the third, which blow sometimes in one direction and sometimes in another, as the prevalent winds of the temperate and arctic zones. The direction of the wind is easily ascertained by a vane. The average velocity of the winds in most countries may be considered as about eighteen to twenty feet in a second; if the velocity is six or seven feet the wind is moderate, if thirty or thirty-five it is fresh, if sixty or seventy it is strong, if eighty or ninety it is a tempest, if ninety or over it is a hurricane. [ANEMOMETER.]

¶ 1. Between wind and water:

(1) Lit.: That part of a ship's side or bottom which frequently rises above the surface of the water through the rolling of the vessel or by fluctuation of the water's surface. Any breach effected by a shot in this part is especially dangerous.

(2) Fig.: Any part or point generally where a blow or attack will most effectually injure.

2. Down the wind:

(1) Lit.: In the direction of and moving with the wind.

(2) Fig.: Towards ruin, decay, or adversity.

* A man that had a great veneration for an image in his house, found that the more he prayed to it to prosper him in the world, the more he went down the wind still. — L'Étranger.

3. How (or which way) the wind blows (or blows):

(1) Lit.: The direction or velocity of the wind.

(2) Fig.: The position or state of affairs; how things are going on, or are likely to turn out.

* Indications are not wanting to show which way the wind blows. — Fleed, Oct. 17, 1855.

4. In the wind's eye; In the teeth of the wind: Forward the direct point from which the wind blows; in a direction exactly opposite to that of the wind.

5. Second wind: [SECOND-WIND].

6. Three sheets in the wind: Tipsy, unsteady from drink. (Slang). [SHEET, s., ¶ (1).]

7. To be in the wind: To be about or likely to happen; to be within the region of surmise or suspicion; as, There is something in the wind now. (Colloq.)

8. To carry the wind:

Manège: To toss the nose as high as the ears. (Said of a horse.)

9. To get wind: [GET (2), v., ¶ 29., 30.]

* 10. To have the wind of: To keep a strict watch on.

"My son and I will have the wind of you."

Shakesp.: Titus Andronicus, iv. 2.

11. To raise the wind: [RAISE, v., ¶ (7).]

12. To sail close to the wind:

(1) Lit. & Naut.: To sail with the ship's head as near to the wind as to fill the sails without shaking them; to sail as much against the direction of the wind as possible.

(2) Fig.: To border or act very closely upon dishonesty or indecency.

* 13. To sow the wind and reap the whirlwind: To act wrongly and recklessly with the result of future punishment for such conduct. (Hosea viii. 7.)

 14. To take wind: To get wind (q.v.).

"The design . . . might have taken wind." — North's Life of Lord Guilford, l. 101.

15. To take the wind out of one's sails: To circumvent; to get or take an advantage of, as by one vessel sailing between the wind and another vessel.

 16. Wind of a ball: [WIND-CONTUSION.]

wind-band, s.

1. A band of musicians who play only or principally on wind instruments.

2. The part of an orchestra which consists of wind-instruments.

wind-barrow, s. [WIND-CARRIAGE.]

 wind-beam, s.

Build.: Formerly a cross-beam used in the principals of roofs, occupying the situation of the collar in modern king-post roofs.

wind-berry, s.

Bot.: Vaccinium Myrtillus.

wind-bill, s.

Scots Law: An accommodation-bill; a bill of exchange granted, without value having been received by the acceptors, for the purpose of raising money by discount.

wind-bore, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: The extremity of the suction-pipe of a pump, usually covered with a perforated plate to prevent the intrusion of foreign substances.

2. Min.: The pump at the bottom of a set of pumps.

 wind-break, v.t. To break the wind of.

"I would wind-break a mule to vie hardens with her." — Ford, (Annals.)

 wind-broken, a. Broken-winded (q.v.).

wind-car, wind-barrow, s. A car or barrow driven wholly or partially by the wind. The Chinese have sails on barrows, to be used when the wind is favourable.

* wind-changing, a. Changing like the wind; fickle, inconstant.

"Wind-changing Warwick now can change no more." — Shakesp.: 2 Henry VI., v. 1.

wind-chest, s.

Music: An air-tight box in an organ or other wind-instrument played by keys, into which the air is received from the wind-trunk, and from which air is admitted by valve-ways through the channels of the sound-board, to the air-ducts communicating with the respective pipes.

† wind-contusion, s.

Medic. Surg.: A name formerly applied to any internal injury produced by a shot or bullet without any external mark of violence, the injury itself being erroneously attributed to what was called "the wind of the ball," i.e., air violently displaced by the velocity of a projectile. It is now known that such injuries are produced either by spent balls or by projectiles striking the body at an oblique angle, when the skin does not always give way, though deep-seated structures, such as the muscles, or large organs, as the liver, may be completely ruptured or crushed.

wind-outer, s.

Music: In an organ-pipe, the lip or edge against which the issuing sheet of air impinges. The vibration thereby imparted is communicated to the column of air in the pipe, producing a musical note whose pitch is determined by the length of the pipe and the quality of the tone by the size of the pipe and the material of which it is made, &c., &c.

wind-dropsy, s. A swelling of the belly from wind in the intestines; tympanitis.

wind-egg, s. An imperfect egg; such eggs are often produced by hens which have been injured or are growing old. They are frequently destitute of a shell, being surrounded only by a skin or membrane, or sometimes by a very thin shell.

* Sound eggs shak, and such as are added with in; so do also those termed hypenemia, or wind-eggs. — Brown: Vulgar Errors, (Todd.)

wind-flower, s.

Bot.: (1) The genus Anemone (q.v.). (2) Gentiana Pneumonanthe. It has an upright stem four to six or eight inches high, and terminal or axillary flowers deep blue, with five broad greenish lines. It grows in moist healthy places in several parts of England. Called also Marsh Gentian. [GENTIAN.]

wind-furnace, s. A blast-furnace (q.v.).

wind-gall, s. A soft tumour on the fetlock joints of a horse.

"His horse . . . full of wind-galls and raled with spavins." — Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, iii. 2.

wind-gauge, † wind-gage, s.

1. An instrument for measuring the velocity and force of the wind; an anemometer (q.v.).

2. An apparatus or contrivance for measuring or indicating the amount of the pressure of wind in the wind-chest of an organ.

wind-god, s.

Anthrop.: A deity presiding over the wind. This might be one of the principal gods, as Eolus, of classic mythology (Homer: Odyssey x., Virgil: Æn. l.), with minor deities subject to him; or one of the minor deities, as among the North American Indians of the present day. (See Longfellow's Song of Hiawatha.)

"In the polytheism of the lower as of the higher races the wind-gods are no unknown figures." — Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1878), ii. 256.

* wind-gun, s. A gun discharged by the force of compressed air; an air-gun. (Pope: Dunciad, l. 181.)

wind-hatch, s.

Mining: The opening or place where the ore is taken out of the earth.

wind-hole, s.

Min.: A shaft or sump sunk to convey air; an air-shaft.

wind-instrument, s.

Music: An instrument played by wind forced into pipes or through reeds, by means of bellows, or directly from the mouth of the performer. An organ contains both flutes (fine) and reed pipes; harmoniums and American organs contain free-reeds. Flutes, oboes, clarinets, and bassoons in an orchestra are called the wood-wind in opposition to the brass-wind instruments, such as trumpets, horns, and trombones.

wind-mill, s. [WINDMILL.]

wind-plant, s.

Bot.: Anemone nemorosa.

wind-pump, s. A pump driven by a wind-wheel.

wind-rod, a.

Naut.: The same as TIDE-RODS (q.v.).

wind-rose, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: A card or table, with lines corresponding to the points of the compass, showing the connection of the wind with the barometer, &c.

2. Bot.: (1) Ranunculus hybridus. [RANUNCULUS.] (2) Papaver Argemone, a British poppy with small flowers, having narrow scarlet petals and a clavate capsule, hispid, with erect bristles; common in English cornfields.

wind-row, s.

1. A row or line of hay raked together for the purpose of being rolled into cocks or heaps; also sheaves of corn set up in a row one against another, in order that the wind may blow between them.

"The grass . . . must be tedded, brought into wind-rows, and turned afterwards with the sunne." — F. Holland: Pinner, bk. xviii, ch. xviii.

2. The green border of a field dug up in order to carry the earth on other land to mend it.

3. A row of peats set up for drying, or a row of pieces of turf, sod, or sward, out in paring and burning.

wind-row, v.t. To rake or gather into wind-rows.

wind-sail, s.

1. Naut.: A canvas tube used as a wind-conductor, having its open mouth presented towards the wind, or in the direction of motion, as on board a steamship, where it is used to direct a current of air down into the engine-room to moderate the intense heat and improve the draught of the fires. The wind-sail is used quite commonly on ships to ventilate and cool the cabins and "tween decks," especially on board vessels in tropical climates.

2. One of the vanes or sails of a windmill.

wind-shake, * wind-shock, s.

Veg. Pathol.: Anemosis, a condition of timber which has caused it to part asunder at the circular lines of junction connecting the several zones of wood. The defect is not discovered till the timber is felled, for there is no external evidence of its existence. Wind-shake is popularly attributed to the agitation produced by violent winds, but Berkeley thinks it more probable that it arises from lightning or from frost.

"The wind-shock is a bruise and shiver throughout the tree, though not constantly visible." — Evelyn: Sylva.

* wind-shaked, a. Driven and agitated by the wind.

"The wind-shaked surge." — Shakesp.: Othello, ii. 1.

* wind-shaken, a. Trembling and tottering in the wind.

"The oak not to be wind-shaken." — Shakesp.: Coriolanus, v. 2.

* wind-shock, s. [WIND-SHAKE.]

* wind-side, s. The windward side.

* wind-sucker, s.

1. Lit. & Ornith.: A windhover (q.v.).

2. Fig.: A person ready to pounce on any person or on any blemish or weak point.

* wind-swift, a. Swift as the wind.

"Therefore hath the wind-swift Cupid wings." — Shakesp.: Romeo & Juliet, ii. 1.

* wind-tight, a. So tight as to exclude the wind.

"Cottages not high built, yet wind-tight and water-tight." — Bp. Hall: Remains, p. 46.

WIND-SAIL

wind-trunk, s.

Music: The air-duct which conducts air from the bellows to the wind-chest of an organ or similar instrument.

wind-way, s.

Mining: A passage for air.

wind-wheel, s. A wheel acted upon by the wind and used to communicate power. Among its familiar applications are the wind-mill, wind-pump, and anemometer.

wind-worn, a. Worn or battered by the wind or weather.

"Its wind-worn battlements are gone."
Byron: Child Harold, III. 22.

wind (2), s. [WIND (2), v.] A winding, a turning, a bend: as, The road takes a wind to the right.

wind (1) (pa. t. winded), v. t. [WIND (1), s.]

1. To give wind to with the mouth; to blow; to sound by blowing.

"Each to Loth Ranza's margin spring;
That blast was winded by the King."
Scott: Lord of the Isles, IV. 18.

¶ In this sense the word is pronounced wind, and the pa. t. is commonly wound, through confusion with WIND (2), v.

2. To perceive or follow by the wind or scent; to nose, as a hound.

"Unluckily they heard or winded us before we saw them."
Field, Feb. 11, 1888.

3. To expose to the wind; to winnow, to ventilate.

4. To drive, ride, or cause to run fast, as a tender scant of wind or breath; to put out of breath.

5. To rest, as a horse, so as to enable him to recover his breath or wind; to breathe.

¶ To wind a ship:

Naut.: To bring it round until the head occupies the place where the stern was, so that the wind may strike the opposite side.

wind (2) (pa. t. wand*, wond*, winded*, wound, pa. par. wound*, wonde*, wunden*, v. t. & i. [A.S. windan (pa. t. wand, wond, ps. par. wunden); cogn. with Dut. winden; Icel. vinda; Dan. vinde; Sw. vinda = to squint; O. H. Ger. wintan; Ger. winden (pa. t. wand, pa. par. gewunden); Goth. windan (in composition). From the same root come wend, wander, wonder, wand, &c.]

wind-ing-ly, adv. [Eng. winding; ly.] In a winding, circuitous, or meandering manner.

wind-lass (1), * wind-ase, * wind-as, * wind-las, * wind-lasse, * wynd-ace, s. [The spelling is a corruption due to popular etymology (as if from wind (2), v., and lace), and to confusion with windlass (2), s. (q.v.). From Icel. windass = a windlass, lit. = a winding-pole, from winda = to wind, and ass = a pole, rafter, yard of a sail, &c.; cogn. with Dut. windas, and O. Dut. windas = a windlass. The l is therefore extraneous, and may have crept in through the influence of windle (q.v.).]

1. A machine for raising weights, such as coals, from a pit, consisting of a cylinder or roller moving on an axle supported on a frame, and turned by levers inserted in square holes cut in the cylinder, or by a crank fitted on to one or both ends of the axle. The end of a rope or chain is attached to the cylinder, and the other to the weight, which is raised by the rope being shortened in passing round the roller. Smaller hoisting engines turned by cranks are called winches. [WINDCH, (1), s.] The windlass used on board ships for raising the anchor or obtaining a purchase on other occasions, consists of a large horizontal roller journaled in standards (windlass-bitts), and rotated by handspikes or other means. It differs from the capstan principally in the horizontality of its axis. The windlass is a modification of the wheel and axle (q.v.).

"The windlass is a sort of large roller, used to wind in the cable or heave up the anchor."—Falconer: Shipwreck, ch. 1, note 2.

2. A handle by which anything is turned; specifically, a winch-like contrivance for bending the arblast, or crossbow (q.v.).

"The arblast was a crossbow, the windlass the machine used in bending that weapon."—Scott: Ivanhoe, ch. xxviii. (Note.)

2. (Pl.): The old stalks of various species of grass (Britten & Holland), especially (1) Cynosurus cristatus, (2) the Spreading Silky Bent Grass (Agrostis or Apera Spica-venti).

 wind-less, * wind-lesse, a. [Eng. wind (1), s.; -less.]

1. Free from or unaffected by wind; calm, smooth.

2. Wanting or having lost the wind; out of breath; breathless.

"The wearie hominis at last retire, Windless."—Fairfax: Geoffrey of Bologne, vii.

 wind-lift, s. [Prob. from Eng. wind (2), v., and lift.] A windlass.

"The author intends no good to all this, but brings it in as a windlift to heave up a gross scandal."—North: Examen, p. 384.

wind-mill, * wind-mulle, * wynd-mylle, s. [Eng. wind (1), s., and mill.]

1. Lit.: A mill which receives its motion by the wind acting on sails, and which is used for grinding grain, raising or pumping water, and other purposes. When wind is employed as the first mover of machinery, it may be applied in two ways: (1) by receiving it upon sails which are nearly vertical, and which give motion to an axis nearly horizontal, in which case the machine is called a vertical windmill; or (2) by receiving it upon vertical sails which move in a horizontal plane, and give motion to a vertical axis, in which case it is called a horizontal windmill. Sometimes the whole mill is made to turn upon a strong vertical post, and is then called a post mill; but more commonly the roof or head (F) only revolves, carrying with it the wind-wheel and its shaft, this weight being supported on friction rollers. In the cut, which is a section of the upper part of a vertical windmill, the sails or vanes AA are attached by the frames to the extremities of the principal axis or wind-shaft (a), which is set nearly horizontally, so that the sails revolve in a plane nearly vertical, and give motion to the driving-wheel (c), which in its turn communicates motion to the shaft (d) and the machinery connected with it. As it is necessary that the extremity of the wind-shaft must always be placed so as to point to the quarter from which the wind blows, a large vane or weather-cock (e) is placed on the side which is opposite the sails, thus turning them always to the wind. But in large mills the motion is regulated by a small supplementary wind-wheel, a pair of sails occupying the place of the vane, and situated at right angles to the principal wind-wheel. When the windmill is in its proper position with the shaft parallel to the wind, these supplementary sails do not turn; but when the wind changes they are immediately brought into action, and, by turning a series of wheel-work, they gradually bring round the head to its proper position. On account of the inconstant nature of the motion of the wind, it is necessary to make some provision for accommodating the resistance of the sails to the degree of violence with which the wind blows. This is done by clothing and unclothing the sails; that is, by covering with canvas or thin boards a greater or smaller portion of the frame of the sails according to the force of the wind.

* 2. Fig.: A visionary project or scheme, a fancy; a chimera.

"He lived and died with general councils in his pate, with windmills of union to concord Rome and England, England and Rome, Germany with them both."—Bailey: Life of Williams, l. 102.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: The fermented juice of the grape. The must or expressed juice of the grapes has a density of from 1065.0 to 1154.0, and contains from 15 to 33 per cent. of sugar. It develops within itself the yeast necessary for the fermentative process, and the action is allowed to proceed until nearly all the sugar has been changed into alcohol and carbonic anhydride. The stronger wines, such as sherry and port, are nearly always fortified for foreign markets by the addition of refined alcohol. The term wine is also applied to various fermented extracts of fruit—e. g., currant and elderberry wines. Besides alcohol, wine contains sugar, bitartrate of potash, odoriferous matter, with small quantities of tannin, gum, acetic and malic acids, lime, &c. The specific gravity of wine varies from .970 to 1.045. The proportion of alcohol in wine varies from about 16.20 per cent. in port to 9.80 per cent. in claret. Wine is largely produced in several countries of Europe, particularly France, Spain, Italy, Germany, and Austria. The United States product has grown to be important, California in particular having become a large wine producer, though the product here is small as compared with that of European countries.

2. Pharm. (Pl.): Medicinal preparations in some respects resembling wine. Sherry is generally employed as the menstruum. There is thus less alcohol in them than in tinctures (q. v.), but enough to prevent their decomposition.

5. A handkerchief. (Slang.) "This here warment's prigg'd your wipe." Barnham: Ingoldsby Legends: The Fortuna One.

wipe (2), s. [Sw. vipa = the lapwing; Dan. vibe; Scotch weep, peesweep (from the cry).] The lapwing or peewit (q.v.). (Prov.)

wip-ër, s. [Eng. wip(e), v.; -er.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. One who wipes.

2. That which is used for wiping. "And the wipers for their noses." Ben Jonson: Masque of Owles.

II. Technically:

1. Mach.: A cam which projects from a horizontal shaft and acts periodically upon a toe whose elevation lifts the valve-rod and puppet-valve. The wiper has usually a rotary reciprocation; when the rotary motion is continuous, it becomes a wiper-wheel (q.v.), which may have a number of cams acting consecutively in the course of a revolution.

2. Small-arms: A worm or sponge.

wiper-wheel, s.

Mach.: A cam-wheel placed below the shank of a tilt-hammer to lift it periodically, allowing it to fall by its own weight. The motion is found in many other machines, such as stamping-mills for ore and stone, &c.

wire, *wier, *wir, *wyer, *wyr, *wyre, s. [A.S. wir = a wire; cogn. with Icel. vírr = wire; Sw. vire = to wind, to twist; cf. O. H. Ger. wira, M. H. Ger. wiere = an ornament of refined gold; Lat. viria = arm-lets of metal; Icel. víravirk = wire-work, flagree-work.]

1. A metallic rod, thread, or filament of small and uniform diameter. The largest size, numbered 0000, of the Birmingham wire-gauge, has a diameter of .454 inch; but smaller sizes even than this, except when drawn out to considerable lengths, are generally known as bars or rods. Lead-wire for the manufacture of bullets may considerably exceed the above diameter. Wire is usually cylindrical, but it is also made of various other forms, as oval, half-round, square, and triangular, and of more complicated shapes for small pinions; for forming the pattern on blocks used in calico-printing, and for other purposes.

"With golden wire to weave her curled head." Spenser: F. Q., III, viii, 7.

2. Used absolutely for telegraph wire, and hence, colloquially, applied to the telegraph itself: as, To send a message by wire.

3. Hence applied to a message sent by telegraph; & a telegram: as, He sent me a wire. (Colloq.)

4. Used in hunting language for wire-fencing.

5. A pickpocket. (Slang.)

¶ Wire of Lapland: A shining slender substance made from the sinews of the reindeer, soaked in water, beaten, and spun into thread. Being then coated with lin, it is used by the Laplanders to embroider their clothes. (Ogilvie.)

wire-bent, s.

Bot.: Nardus stricta.

wire-bridge, s. A bridge suspended by cables made of wire.

wire-cartridge, s. A cartridge for fowling in which the charge of shot has wire ligaments.

wire-cloth, s. A fabric whose woof and weft are of wire; the size of the wire, the shape and sizes of the meshes, being adapted to the uses of the completed screen, sifter, or sieve, or the character of the machius in which it is to be used.

wire-edge, s. A thin wire-like edge, formed on a cutting tool by over sharpening it on one side.

wire-fence, wire-fencing, s. A fence made of parallel strands of wire, generally galvanized, strained between upright posts placed at suitable distances apart. Of late years wire-fencing has to a considerable extent taken the place of the old quick hedges, being easily transferred from place to place, so as to inclose different portions of ground at different times as required. It also has the advantages of being durable and of overshadowing or occupying no cultivable ground.

wire-gauge, s. A gauge for measuring the thickness of wire and sheet-metals. It is usually a plate of steel having a series of apertures around its edge, each corresponding in width to the diameter of wire of a certain number.

wire-gauze, s. A fine, close quality in wire-cloth.

wire-grass, s.

Bot.: A name given to Eleusine indica and Poa compressa.

wire-grate, s. A grate or contrivance of fine wire-work, used to keep insects out of vineries, hothouses, &c.

wire-grub, s. [WIRE-WORM.]

wire-guard, s. A framework of wire-netting used as a guard in front of a fire.

wire-heel, s. A defect and disease in the feet of a horse or other beast.

wire-iron, s. Black rod-iron for drawing into wire. (Stimmonds.)

wire-mattress, s. A mattress having a web of wire-cloth or chain stretched in a frame for supporting a bed.

wire-micrometer, s. A micrometer having spider lines or very fine wires across the field. The wires are stranged in parallel and intersecting series, and some are movable by screws. [MICROMETER-SCREW.]

wire-netting, s. A texture of wire coarser than wire-gauze and wire-cloth.

wire-puller, s. One who pulls the wires, as of a puppet; hence, one who operates by secret means; one who, being himself behind the scenes and unknown, exercises a powerful influence, especially in political affairs; an intriguer.

"An obscure knot of local wire-pullers, who style themselves an association." Observer, Sept. 27, 1886.

wire-pulling, s. The act of pulling the wires, as of a puppet; hence, secret influence or management; intrigue.

"Disgusted with the amount of wire-pulling which has been carried on of late by the numerous committees." Daily Telegraph, Nov. 1, 1868.

wire-road, s. [WIRE-TRAMWAY.]

wire-rope, s. A collection of wires twisted or bound together, so as to act in unison in resisting a strain. It is composed of strands of untwisted hard wire laid spirally around a central core of hemp or wire; a number of these strands, without any additional twist being placed around a hempen core, form the rope.

wire-tramway, s. A mode of conveyance by or upon a wire supported on posts. Called also Wire-road and Wire-way.

wire-twist, s. A kind of gun-barrel made of a ribbon of iron and steel, coiled around a mandrel and welded. The ribbon is made by welding together laminae of iron and steel or two qualities of iron, and drawing the same between rollers into a ribbon.

wire-way, s. [WIRE-TRAMWAY.]

wire-wheel, s. A brush-wheel made of wire, iron, or brass, instead of bristles, used for cleaning and scratching metals, preparatory to gilding or silvering, or matting polished metallic surfaces.

wire-work, s. Any kind of fabric made of iron.

wire-worker, s. One who manufactures articles from wire.

wire-worm, wire-grub, s. [WIRE-WORM.]

wire-wove, a. A term applied to a paper of fine quality and glazed, used chiefly for letter-paper.

"Wrapped up in hot-pressed and wire-wove paper." Knox: Essay No. 174.

wire, v.t. & i. [WIPE, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To bind with wire; to apply wire to: as, To wire a cork.

2. To put upon a wire: as, To wire beads.

3. To form of wire; to insert wire in.

"Almost every fence seems to be wired." Field, April 4, 1885.

4. To snare by means of a wire: as, To wire birds. [WIREN.]

5. To send by telegraph, as a message; to telegraph.

"Scarcely had the news been wired from Newmarket." Daily Telegraph, Oct. 6, 1885.

B. Intransitive:

* 1. To flow in currents, as thin as wire.

"Then to small streams (through all the idle wiring)." P. Fletcher: Purple Island, vi.

2. To communicate by means of the telegraph; to telegraph.

"The Admiralty wired to the Plymouth Division Royal Marines." Daily Telegraph, Dec. 8, 1867.

¶ To wire in: To apply one's self closely and perseveringly to anything; to set to with vigour; to press forward with a view to having a share. (Slang.)

wire-draw, *wier-draw, v.t. [Eng. wire, and draw.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: To form into wire, as a metal, by forcibly pulling through a series of holes, gradually decreasing in diameter.

* 2. Figuratively:

(1) To draw out into length; to elongate.

(2) To draw or spin out to great length of tenity: as, To wire-draw an argument.

(3) To draw by act or violence; to twist.

"Nor am I for forcing, or wire-drawing the sense of the text." South: Sermons, vol. v., ser. ii.

II. Steam-eng.: To draw off, as steam, through narrow ports, thus wasting part of its effect.

wire-draw-ër, *wier-draw-cr, s. [Eng. wire, and drawer.] One who draws metal into wire. (Chaucer: Test. Love, bk. iii.)

wire-draw-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [WIRE-DRAW.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. Lit.: The act or process of drawing metal into wire. The metal to be extended is first hammered into a bar or rod. The rods, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 1 inch in diameter, received from the rolling-mills in bundles, are heated and rolled in grooved rollers, one above the other, so that the rod runs from the first roll to the second, and so on, without reheating. The rollers run with great rapidity, reducing the rod to a coarse wire, which is then passed through the successive holes in the draw-plate, a flat piece of hard steel having holes corresponding to the various numbers or sizes of wire. The best are made of a combined plate of highly-tempered steel and wrought-iron. The holes are tapering, the smallest opening being on the steel side through which the wire first enters. [DRAW-PLATE.] Very fine gold and platinum wires, used for the spider-lens of telescopes, are formed by coating the metal with silver, which is then drawn down to a great tenacity, after which the silver coating is removed by nitric acid, leaving an almost invisible interior wire, which has been so attenuated that a mile in length weighed only a grain. Wiredrawing seems to have arisen at Augsburg or Nuremberg in the fourteenth century. In 1403 and 1484 the importation of iron wire into England was prohibited. The manufacture was soon after attempted in England, but did not make much progress till a patent was granted, in 1565, to certain Dutchmen and Germans to carry it and some other processes out. The United States has grown to be one of the leading wire-producing countries.

2. Fig.: The act of drawing out an argument or discussion to prolixity and attenuation by needless refinements, distinctions, disquisitions, and the like.

wire-drawn, pa. par. & a. [WIREDRAW.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Oril. Lang.: Drawn out or extended to prolixity, as an argument, &c.

2. Steam: A term applied to the condition of steam when the pipes or ports leading to the cylinder have not sufficient carrying capacity.

wir'-er, s. [Eng. wir(e), v.; -er.] One who uses a wire; specif., one who snares game. [WIRE, v., A. 4.]

"The nightly wirer of their innocent hare."
Tennyson: Aylmer's Field, 490.

wire'-worm, s. [Eng. wire, and worm.] [See def.]

Entom. & Agric.: The name given by farmers and others to a kind of vermiform larva, long, slender, cylindrical, and somewhat rigid. Most wireworms are the larvae of the Elateridae. Some live in rotten stumps of trees, others gnaw roots in kitchen garden and other plants, cereals, grass on lawns, &c. Some of them live in the larva state for three years. One of the most common wireworms is the larva of Cataglyphis opacitor. The last segment of the body is long, entire, and wire-like. It is believed that the form of this species suggested the prefix wire in the name wireworm. It attacks the roots of lettuce, eating them as far as the collar, with the effect of killing the plant. Ariotes lineatus similarly devours the roots of the oat, causing the leaves to wither and the plant to die. The larva of Hemirhynchus sordidus feeds on the roots of plants with the same destructive effect. The rook, the domestic fowl, and the mole are natural foes of the wireworms. The name is sometimes applied to the fulidæ.

wir'-i-ness, s. [Eng. wiry; -ness.] The quality or state of being wiry.

wir'-ing, pr. par. or a. [WIRE, v.]

wiring-machine, s. An apparatus for securing a soda-water or other bottle while the cork is being wired.

* wir'-ry, v.t. [WORRY, v.]

wir'-y, *wier-y, *wir-ic, a. [Eng. wir(e), a.; -y.]

1. Made of wire; like wire.

"Rending her yellow locks, like wiric gold."
Spenser: Ruines of Time, 10.

2. Lean but shrewy; tough.

"Mounted on wiry station horses."
Globe, March 25, 1868.

wis, adv. [See def.] A fictitious verb given in many dictionaries, with a pa. t. wis, and with the meanings to know, to be aware, to think, &c. The mistake arose from the adverb wis, wis = certainly, in which the prefix (like most other prefixes) was frequently written apart from the rest of the word, and not infrequently the i was represented by a capital I, so that it appeared as I wis. Hence the I has been mistaken for the first personal pronoun, and the verb wis created. [Ywis.]

wis-alls, wis-omes, s. [Etym. doubtful.] The leaves and tops of carrots and parsnips. [Prov.]

wis'-ard, s. [WIZARD.]

wis'-dōm, *wis-dam, *wys-dome, *wyse-dome, s. [A.S. wisdom, from wis = wise, and sult, -dōm = Eng. -doom = judgment; Icel. wisdom; Sw. wisdom; Dan. wisdom, wisdom.]

* I. Ordinary Language:

1. The quality or state of being wise; the power or faculty of seeing into the heart of things and of forming the fittest and best judgment in any matter presented for consideration; knowledge and the capacity to make due use of it; knowledge of or the capacity to discern the best ends and the best means; a combination of discernment, judgment, sagacity, or similar powers with knowledge, especially that knowledge which is gained from experience. (It is often nearly synonymous with discernion, sagacity, or prudence, and frequently it implies little more than sound common-sense, perfect soundness of mind or intellect, and hence is often opposed to folly.)

"Show your wisdom, daughter,
In your close patience."
Shakep.: Measure for Measure, iv. 2.

2. Human learning, science, knowledge, erudition; knowledge of arta and sciences.

"Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians."
Acts vi. 22.

* 3. Quickness of intellect; readiness of apprehension; dexterity in execution.

"In the hearts of all that are wise hearted I have put wisdom that they may make all that I have commanded them."
Ecclesi xxii. 7.

* 4. Natural instinct and sagacity.

"God hath deprived her [the peacock] of wisdom, neither hath he imparted to her understanding."
Job xxxix. 17.

* 5. With a possessive pronoun, used as a title of respect. (Cf. your highness, your worship, &c.)

"Under such a religious orderly Government, as your Wisdoms, upon the abolishing of Episcopacy, shall please to erect among us."
W. Prynne: Antipædæ, p. 11.

II. Script.: Right judgment concerning religious and moral truth; true religion; piety; the knowledge and fear of God and sincere and uniform obedience to his commands.

"So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom."
Psalms ix. 12.

¶ (1) The Wisdom of Solomon:

Apocrypha: An apocryphal book, named in Gr. Σοφία Σολομών (Sophia Solōmōn), or Σολομώντος (Solōmōntos), generally placed sixth in order between "the rest of Esther" and Ecclesiasticus. Its author professes that he is a king (vii. 1-6; ix. 7), and son of a worthy father, also a king (12). He himself prayed to God for wisdom and received it, wealth being superadded (vii. 7-13). God directed him to build a temple on the holy mount on the model of the Tabernacle (ix. 8), from all which it is obvious that the author claims to be Solomon, the son of David, King of Israel. The book is now divided into nineteen chapters. The first of these exhorts judges to love righteousness, and commends wisdom to them and others. The second denounces the unbelief of the ungodly, and traces to this source the wickedness of their lives. The third, fourth, and fifth point out that for the righteous there is a happy future, whilst an opposite destiny awaits the wicked. Chapters vi.-ix. highly commend wisdom. Portions of them resemble corresponding exhortations and descriptions in the Books of Proverbs (cf. Wisd. vi. 12-15 with Prov. viii. 17-21; ix. 9 with Prov. viii. 25-30). The advantages of wisdom are shown in chapters x.-xii. by illustrations taken from the history recorded in the Pentateuch (it is remarkable that the author adds no more modern examples). In chapters xiii.-xv. the folly of idolatry is exhibited in language of great beauty and force, and a philosophic explanation of its origin is attempted. (Cf. Wisd. xiii. 11-16 with Isaias xlv. 12-20). The last four chapters contrast the providence which watches over the wise and the pious with the judgments which overtake idolaters and the ungodly, historical illustrations, as before, being derived solely from the Mosaic writings. Though the book is called "The Wisdom of Solomon," there is no reason to believe that he was its author. It was composed originally in Greek, probably by some Jew resident in Alexandria. It incorporates words from the Septuagint version of Isaias iii. 10, xlv. 20 (circ. a. c. 284-246), and therefore was subsequently acquainted with this book (cf. Wisd. xiv. 21-27 with Rom. i. 19-22; Wisd. xv. 7 with Rom. ix. 21; Wisd. ix. 15 with 1 Cor. xv. 53, and 2 Cor. v. 1, and Wisd. v. 17-20 with Ephes. vi. 11-17). It is not influenced by Philo (a. c. 20 to A. D. 40 (?), and in all likelihood was earlier than his era. Its more probable date was a. c. 150 to 50, or more approximately a. c. 120 to 86. If these dates are nearly correct, then Wisdom is the most ancient Jewish book except Daniel (xii. 2, 8), in which the doctrine of rewards and punishments in a future state is clearly set forth; but it differs from Daniel in teaching the immortality of the soul, without reference to the resurrection of the body. It is the first book which identifies the serpent which tempted Eve with the Devil (cf. Wisd. li. 24 with Gen. iii. 1-5, 14, John viii. 44, and Rev. xii. 9, xx. 10). No one can study the Book of Wisdom without entertaining high respect for its author, and deriving profit from his ethical teachings. For thoughtful and beautiful sentiments see l. 4, 6; iv. 8, 9; vi. 18; xvii. 11, 12, &c.

(2) The Wisdom of Jesus, the son of Sirach: Apocrypha: [ECCLESIASTICUS].

wisdom-tooth, s. The popular name for the third molar in each jaw. [TOOTH, s., II. 1.] They appear between the ages of seventeen and twenty-five, when a person may be presumed to have attained some degree of experience or wisdom.

sponding to A.S. witega, witega = a prophet.]

* 1. A learned or wise man; a sayer of wise things.

"Pythagoras learned much, . . . becoming a mythical wisecore."—Leland.

2. One who makes pretensions to great learning or wisdom; hence, contemptuously or ironically, a would-be wise person, a fool, a simpleton.

"There were, at that time, on the bench of justices many Sir Pauls, Eithersides, hard-anseling, superstitious wisecores."—Ben Jonson: The Devil is an Ass,
v. 6. (Note L.)

wise-līng, s. [Eng. wise; dimin. suff.
ling.] One who pretends to be wise; a wise-acre.

"These wiselings, that show themselves fools in so speaking."—Donne: Septuagint, p. 214.

wise-lý, * wis-liche, * wise-li, adv.

wisenesse wolth thou not do hym worship?"—*Chaucer:
Testament of Love*, bk. II.

wi-šer-inc, wi-šer-ite (w as v), s. [After Herr Wiser of Zurich; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineralogy:

1. A name given by Kenngott to a mineral occurring in small square prisms with square pyramids implanted on crystals of iron-glance ("eisenrose"). The same as XENOTIME (q.v.).

2. A mineral occurring in somewhat complex crystal-forms sent to Klein under this name was found to be Anatase (q.v.). Found implanted on the sides of flasures of the schists of the Binnenthal, Wallis, Switzerland.

3. The same as RHODOCHROSITE (q.v.).

wish, * wische, * wissche, v.t. & t. [A.S. wyscan, wiscan = to wish, from wisc = a wish (q.v.); cogn. with Dut. wenschen; Icel. ækja; Dan. ønске; Sw. onska; O. H. Ger. wunscan; Ger. wünschen. An n appears therefore to have been lost from the English word, the proper form of which should be wish. From the same root as Sansc. van = to ask; Eng. win (q.v.).]

A. Intransitive:

1. To have a wish or desire; to cherish a desire, either for what is, or for what is not supposed to be attainable; to long. (Followed by for before the object desired.)

"The ewetts we wish for."
—Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 867.

2. To be disposed or inclined; to have certain feelings (with well or ill): as, He wishes well (or ill) towards you.

* 3. To hope or fear in a slight degree, or with a preponderance of fear over hope.

"I wish it may not prove some ominous foretoken of misfortune, to have met with such a miser as I am."—Sidney.

B. Transitive:

1. To desire; to long for.

"I would not wish any companion."
—Shakesp.: Tempest, III. 1.

2. Followed by an infinitive or clause.

"I wish above all things that thou mayest prosper."
—John 2.

3. To frame or express a desire or wish concerning; to desire to be (with words completing the sense).

"He could wish himself in Thames."—*Shakesp.:
Henry* I., iv. 1.

4. To imprecate or call down upon; to invoke.

"Let them be driven backward, and put to shame that wish me evil."—Psalms xl. 14.

* 5. To ask, to desire, to invite, to request, to bid.

"I will wish thee over more to dance."
—Shakesp.: Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

* 6. To recommend; to commit to another's confidence, kindness, or care with favouring representations; to commend with a view to the acceptance of.

"If I can by any means light on a fit man to teach her that wherein she delights, I will wish him to her father."—Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, I. 1.

wish, * wusch, s. [A.S. wisc; cogn. with
O. Dut. wunsch; Icel. ösk; O. H. Ger. wunsc;
Ger. wunsch.]

I. Ordinary Language:

For such a wish."
—Shakesp.: Romeo & Juliet, III. 2.

3. That which is desired or wished for; the object of desire.

"Be assured . . .
Thy wish, exactly to thy heart's desire."
—Milton: P. L., VIII. 451.

II. Compar. Relig.: A word often occurring in ancient Teutonic mythology, and used to signify the sum-total of well-being and blessedness, the fulness. In the Middle Age Wish (Wunsch) appears to have been personified by the poets as a mighty creative being. (See extract.)

"That Wish was personified, and very boldly by the Christian poets, is abundantly proved. That he was ever believed in as a person, even in heathen times, is, to my thinking, far from clear. I believe some German scholars regard the notion as little better than a mere name."—Grimm: Deut. Mythol. (Eng. ed.), I. 143. (Trautslator's note.)

wish-bone, s. [WISHING-BONE.]

wish-child, s.

Anthropology:

1. An adopted child.

2. The child of a wish-wife (q.v.). (Grimm.)

and wish-maidens in his train."—*Grimm: Deut.
Mythol.* (Eng. ed.), I. 143.

wish-wife, s.

Anthropology:

1. A female deity; especially one acting as a handmaid to the gods, and as a revealer and guardian to men.

2. A supernatural being whose presence her mortal lover can procure by wishing for it (Grimm.)

* wish-a-ble, a. [Eng. wish, v.; -able.] Capable or worthy of being wished for or desired; desirable.

"The glad and wishable tidings of ascension."
—Vat: Luke iv.

wished, pa. par. or a. [WISH, v.]

* wish-éd-ly, adv. [Eng. wished; -ly.] According to desire.

ing; ardent in ardent desire.

"Sadness and softness, hopefulness, wishfulness."
—Taylor: Isaac Comenius, III. 1.

wish-íng, pr. par., a., & s. [WISH, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.:

1. Ord. Lang.: (See the verb.)

2. Anthrop.: Connected with or bestowed by Wish (WISH, s., II.); bestowing the best that the heart can wish. The expression is borrowed from Scandinavian and Teutonic mythology, though the idea is found in the folk-tales of many other races. Grimm (*Deut.
Mythol.*) identifies the wishing purse of Fortunatus, which was never empty, with the Cornucopia; his wishing cap, which transported him from place to place, with the petasus of Hermes; and in the wishing rod, credited with the power of enabling its owner to discover and obtain gold or other treasure buried in the earth, he sees a reference to the Caduceus.

C. As subst.: A wish, a desire; the expression of a wish.

"Her longings, wishings, hopes, all finished be."
—Davies: Immort. of the Soul, xxx.

Shrubs from the tropics of Asia and America. Wisandula rostrata is a native of the Malay Peninsula, Java, tropical Africa and America, and is cultivated in Ceylon and India. The bark abounds in useful flaxen fibres; it also yields a good hemp.

* wisse, * wisse, v.t. [A.S. wistan; O. Low. Ger. wissan; Icel. wisa; O. H. Ger. wisan, wissan.] To teach, to show, to instruct.

"Or we depart I shall thee so wel wisse, That of this hous we shall thou never misse." Chaucer: C. T., 6, 988.

wit, pref. & pa. par. of v. [Wit, v.]

wis-tár-i-á, s. [Named after Caspar Wistar (1761-1818), Professor of Anatomy in the University of Pennsylvania.]

Bot. : A genus of Galegeæ. Climbing shrubs, with pinnate leaves, and axillary and terminal racemes of flowers. Wistaria frutescens, a native of this country, bears beautiful bluish purple flowers. W. chinensis, a Chinese species, bears large pendulous racemes of flowers.

* wiste, pref. & pa. par. of v. [Wit, v.]

wist-fúl, a. [A word of doubtful origin. According to Skeat it is nothing more than a corruption of wishful, which was once common, and which it has supplanted. The change in form is probably due to confusion with wistly, which was itself a corruption of Mid. Eng. wistly (q.v.).]

1. Earnestly or eagerly attentive; carefully or anxiously observant.

"These wistful myriads eye their prey." Scott: Don Roderick, Conc. v.

2. Full of thought; pensive, contemplative, thoughtful.

"Why, Grubbinol, dost thou so wistful seem?" Gay: Pastorals, Friday L.

3. Pensive or melancholy from the absence or want of something; earnest from a feeling of desire; longing.

"I cast many a wistful, melancholy look towards the sea." Swift: (Todd.)

wist-fúl-ly, adv. [Eng. wistful; -ly.]

1. In a wistful manner; longingly, wishfully.

"Wistfully she raised Her head from off her pillow to look forth." Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. I.

2. Earnestly, attentively.

3. Thoughtfully, musingly, pensively.

* wis-tí-tí, s. [OUISTTIL.]

* wist-léss, a. [Eng. wist; -less.] Unknowing. "Wistless what I did, half from the sheath Drew the well-tempered blade." Southey: Joan of Arc, bk. I.

* wist-ly, adv. [WISTFUL.]

1. Observingly, attentively, earnestly, closely.

"A wild beast . . . doth stand full against the dog stars when it riseth, looketh wistly upon it."—Holland: Plinius, bk. II., ch. xl.

2. Wistfully, longingly. (A doubtful use.)

wit, * wit-en, * witte, * wy-ten (pr. t. wot, wost, woi; pl. witen; pa. t. * wist, * wiste, * wist, * wot, pa. par. wist), v.t. or t. [A.S. witan = to know (pr. t. to wát, thú wást, he wát; pl. witon; anhj. sing. wite, pl. witon; pa. t. wiste, wisse; 2nd pers. wisses, pl. wiston; pa. par. wist). Allied to witan = to see (pa. t. wite, pl. witon). It is clear that to wát is really an old past tense (prob. of witan), used as a present, causing the necessity of creating a new past tense, wisse, or wiste which is, however, of great antiquity. . . The gerund is to witanne, whence Mod. English to wit. Cogn. with Dut. weten (p. t. wist, pa. par. geweten); Icel. wita (pr. t. veit; pa. t. við; pa. par. vitadr); Dan. vide (pr. t. vide; pa. t. vidste; pa. par. vidte); Sw. wela (pr. t. vet; pa. t. visste; pa. par. veten); Ger. wissen (pr. t. weiss; pa. t. wusste; pa. par. gewusst); Goth. witan (pr. t. wait; pa. t. wisso); Lat. video = to see; Gr. ᾠδῖν (oidin) = to see; οἶδα (oida) = I know; Sansc. vid = to perceive, to know. Wit is the infin. mood; to wit (as in "We do you to wit") is the gerund; wot is the 1st and 3rd pers. of the present indicative, the 3rd pers. being often corruptly written woteth; wost (later form wotest) is the 2nd pers. sing. of the same tense; wiste (later wist), is the pa. t., and wist is the pa. par. (Skeat.)]

1. To know, to learn; to be or become aware. (Used either with or without an object.)

(1) Infinitive: "And his sister stood afar off to wit what would be done unto him."—Ezekiel, II. 4.

(2) Present tense: "I wot well where he is." Shakespeare: Romeo & Juliet, III. 2.

(3) Past tense: "He wist not what to say, for they were all afraid."—Mark ix. 6.

(4) Present participle: "As witting I use other comfort have." Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI., II. 5.

¶ To wit is used chiefly to call attention to something particular, or as introductory to a detailed statement of what has just before been mentioned generally, and as equivalent to namely: as, There were three present, to wit, Mr. Green, Mr. Black, and Mr. Brown.

* 2. To joke.

"Bristow doth pretend to wit it on his pulpit-libel."—Heylin: Life of Laud, p. 260.

wit, * witte, * wyt, s. [A.S. wit = knowledge, from witan = to know; cogn. with Icel. vit; Dan. vit; Sw. velt; O. H. Ger. wiggi; Ger. witz.] [Wit, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. Knowledge, understanding. "As concerning melleiousness, be children, but in wit be perfects."—1 Corinth. xiv. 20. (1851.)

2. The mental powers; intellect; intellectual power.

"My wit untrained to any kind of art." Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI., I. 2.

3. A superior degree of intelligence or understanding; bright reasoning powers; wisdom, sagacity. "If I might teach thee wit, better it were, Though not to love, yet, love, to tell me so." Shakespeare: Sonnet 110.

4. Common sense; sense. "I have the wit to think my master is a kind of knave."—Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen, III. 1.

5. Imaginative and inventive faculty; power of invention; contrivance, ingenuity. "Past the wit of man to say what dream it was." Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, IV. 1.

6. The power of original combination under the influence of the imagination. "Men who have a great deal of wit, and prompt memories, have not always the clearest judgment, or deepest reason."—Locke: Human Understanding, bk. II., ch. xl.

7. The faculty of associating ideas in a new and ingenious, and at the same time natural and pleasing way, exhibited in apt language and felicitous combination of words and thoughts, by which unexpected resemblances between things apparently unlike are vividly set before the mind, as to produce a shock of pleasant surprise; facetiousness.

"True wit is nature to advantage dress, What oft was thought, but ne'er so well express." Pope: Essay on Criticism, II. 97.

¶ Perhaps the clearest definition of wit would be, that it is a combination of ideas which creates a feeling of surprise at the unexpected congruity of things apparently incongruous. Hence it would seem to be the power of comparison that creates wit; but there are many unexpected combinations of this character, which, as Sydney Smith justly observes, would be witty if they were not sublime or beautiful. A strong sense of grandeur or beauty overpowers or takes away the sense of wit. He instances the idea in Campbell's Lochiel—"which, as he remarks, would be witty if it were not sublime. The awe and reverence awakened by the highest subjects connected with our faith also destroy the impression of wit; but in the works of many of our most eminent religious writers, and even in the Scriptures, may be found happy combinations, which, but for the sanctity of the subject, would awaken the sense of wit. An unexpected fitness, then, seems to form the essence of wit; and as the same writer we have referred to observes, among the uneducated and children the same kind of feeling is often awakened by a combination of things as well as of thoughts, such as the putting together of a puzzle. (Trench: Synonyms.)

8. One who has genius, fancy, or humour; a person of learning and refined ideas; an accomplished scholar.

"He did not, however, in the least affect the character of a wit or of an orator."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vii.

9. In modern usage one distinguished or noted for bright or amusing sayings; a humorist.

"The wits and the Puritans had never been on friendly terms."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

10. (Pl.) The understanding, the intellect. "His wits are not so blunt." Shakespeare: Much Ado, III. 5.

II. Technically:

1. Bot. : (1) Hyoscyamus luteus; (2) Nicotiana rustica. (Britten & Holland.) [Tabacco.]

2. Phrenol. : The faculty which disposes its possessor to mirthfulness. Alone, or in combination with other faculties, it produces the tendency to mirth, humour, satire, &c. Spurzheim classified it with the affective faculties. Gall and Combe considered it intellectual. It is situated on the upper part of the forehead, towards one side.

¶ 1. At one's wits' end: At a complete loss what further steps or measures to adopt; having exhausted the last known plan or contrivance. "Now your counsels, For I am at my wits' end." Beaumont & Fletcher: Mad Lover, IV.

* 2. The five wits: An old expression, sometimes used for the five senses, but oftener defined common wit, imagination, fantasy, estimation, memory.

"My five wits nor my five senses can Dissuade one foolish heart from serving thee." Shakespeare: Sonnet 141.

* wit-cracker, s. One who breaks jests; a joker.

"A college of wit-crackers cannot flout me out of my humour."—Shakespeare: Much Ado, v. 9.

* wit-craft, s.

1. Art of reasoning; logic.

"Am I not witch'd like her? or thou not false like him?"—Shakep.: 2 Henry VI., iii. 2.

witch-craft, * witche-craft, s. [A.S. wicecraft, from wice = a witch, and craft = craft, art.]

1. The practices of witches; a supernatural power which persons were formerly supposed to obtain by entering into a compact with the devil. The compact was sometimes express, whether oral or written, when the witch adjured God and Christ, and dedicated herself wholly to the evil one; or only implied, when she actually engaged in his service, practised infernal arts, and renounced the sacraments of the church. The express compact was sometimes solemnly confirmed at a general meeting, at which the devil presided, and sometimes privately made by the witch signing the articles of agreement with her own blood, or by the devil writing her name in his "black book." The contract was sometimes of indefinite duration, at other times for a certain number of years. The witch was bound to be obedient to the devil in everything, while the other party to the act delivered to the witch an imp, or familiar spirit, to be ready at call and to do whatever was directed. [ELY, s., l. 1. (5), 7.] He further engaged that they should want for nothing, and be able to assume whatever shape they pleased to visit and torment their enemies and accomplish their infernal ends. The belief in witchcraft is of great antiquity. The punishment for witchcraft was death, generally by burning. The number of people put to death in England has been estimated at about 30,000. Statutes were passed against witchcraft in the reigns of Henry VI., Henry VII. (1541), Elizabeth (1563), and James I. (1604). During the sitting of the Long Parliament 5,000 persons are said to have been executed on the charge of witchcraft. Judicial convictions were checked chiefly by the firmness of Judge Holt, who in about ten trials, from 1694 to 1701, charged the juries in such a manner as to cause them to bring in verdicts of acquittal. The first law against witchcraft in Scotland was passed in 1563. The last victim in England was Mrs. Hicker, and her daughter nine years of age, executed in 1716, and the last in Scotland suffered in 1722. The prosecution of supposed witches was by no means confined to England. All Europe was infected with the delusion, and it is estimated that not less than 300,000 persons were executed as witches during the prevalence of this epidemic of superstition, which for several centuries afflicted Europe. The last judicial victim of the delusion was a servant girl at Glarus, in German Switzerland, who was put to death for witchcraft in 1782. This country did not quite escape the epidemic, though fortunately its share in it was a small one. The Salem Witchcraft persecution, under which nineteen executions took place in 1691-92, was the most deplorable outbreak of the cruelty of superstition which the territory of the United States has ever known. An execution for witchcraft had taken place in New England as early as 1648, but after the reaction in public opinion which began in 1693, this shameful delusion came to an end, so far as persons in authority were concerned. The most absurd ideas were entertained by the believers in witchcraft. Witches, they held, with the aid of the devil, could produce mice and vermin, rob men of their powers by a touch or a breath, raise storms, foretell events, change themselves into cats and other animals, and perform other magical feats. [WALPPOIS-NIGHT.]

2. Power more than ordinary or natural; irresistible influence; fascination.

"She loved me for the dangers I had pass'd; And I loved her that she did my death."—Shakep.: Othello, l. 1.

wit-ën-äg-ë-môt, wit-ën-äg-ë-môte, s. [A.S. witena-gemot = an assembly of wise men, from witena, gen. pl. of wita = a wise man; witan = to know, and gemot = a meeting, an assembly, a moot.]

Eng. Hist.: Amongst the Anglo-Saxons the great national or general assembly which met annually or oftener, wherever the king kept his Christmas, Easter, or Whitsuntide, as well as to do private justice as to consult upon public business. It was composed of the aethelings, or princes, ealdormen, or nobles, the large landowners, the principal ecclesiastics, &c. They formed the highest court of judicature in the kingdom, and their concurrence was necessary to give validity to laws, and treaties with foreign states. They had even power to elect the king, and if the throne passed to the heir of the late king, the new sovereign had to be recognized formally by the witenagemot at a meeting assembled for the purpose.

fäte, fät, färe, amidst, wät, fäll, father; wé, wët, hère, camél, hër, thäre; pine, pít, sire, sir, marine; gó, póé, or, wóre, wólf, wórck, wó, sön; müte, cüb, cüre, unite, our, rüle, füll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = é; ey = ä; qu = kw.

"His passing miraculous that your doll and blind worship should so suddenly turn both sightful and witful." Chapman: Masque of Middle Temple.

with, prep. [A.S. with = with, and also often against (a sense still preserved in such phrases as to fight with = to fight against); cogn. with. Icel. við = against, by, at, with Dan. ved = by, at; Sw. vid = near, by, at. With has been to a great extent taken the place of A.S. and Mid. Eng. mid = with, which is now obsolete.] [WITHERS.] A preposition or particle used to denote, indicate, designate, or express:

(1) Competition, antagonism, or opposition. "His face still combatting with tears." Shakespeare: Richard II, v. 2.

(2) A being together or in the company of; companionship; company; identity of place. "I lingered with you at your shop." Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, III. 1.

(3) Mutual action or suffering; association or union in action, purpose, thought, feeling, or the like; partnership; intercourse; sympathy.

"With thee she talks, with thee she moans; With thee she sighs, with thee she groans; With thee she says: 'Farewell mine own!'" Surrey: Descript. of the State of the Lower.

(4) Junction or community; concomitance; consequence, appendage, addition; accessories, accompaniments. "A tongue with a tang." Shakespeare: Tempest, II. 2.

(5) Simultaneity; identity of time or immediate accession. "The world hath ending with thy life." Shakespeare: Venus & Adonis, 12.

(6) A being on the side or in favour of; sympathy, assistance, friendship, partisanship. "He that is not with me is against me."—Matthew XII. 30.

(7) Holding a place in the estimation, opinion, consideration, judgment, or thoughts; upon. "Such arguments had invincible force with those pagan philosophers who became Christians."—Addison. [Told.]

(8) A means. "I'll smother thee with kisses." Shakespeare: Venus & Adonis, 18.

(9) Before means of nourishment = on or upon. "To dine and sup with water and bran."—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure, IV. 2.

(10) A cause. "He burns with bashful shame: she, with her tears, both quench the maiden burning of his cheeks." Shakespeare: Venus & Adonis, 49.

(11) An external agency by which an effect is produced, at one time usually (and at present exclusively) expressed by the preposition by. "Brought with armed men back to Messina." Shakespeare: Much Ado, v. 4.

(12) Correspondence, comparison, likeness. "Weigh oath with oath." Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, III. 2.

(13) Sometimes = like. "As if with Cleo she would change my shape." Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI, v. 2.

(14) At; in consequence of. "I feel remorse in myself with his words." Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI, IV. 7.

By, with, and through are closely allied in many of their uses, and it is difficult to lay down a rule by which their uses may be distinguished. For the difference between with and by, see By. Trench (Synonyms) further discriminates between them as follows:

"Whenever a certain effect is implied as proceeding from two causes, the remote and original cause is expressed by the use of by, and the immediate one by with. For instance: The tree was cut down by a woodman with an axe. If we said, by an axe, it would imply some free agency on the part of the axe. With a woodman, on the other hand, would imply that the woodman was an unconscious instrument in the tree's destruction. On the other hand, whenever a conscious agent is implied, we use the word by. In general, with is improper, not only when a conscious agent is supposed, but when the agent is personified to a certain degree in our own minds, from its action being apparently voluntary. By and with are often used when no agent is spoken of, but a certain object is said to be accomplished by certain means. But in this case, by implies that the means used are essential; with, only that they are useful in aiding our endeavours. Through is somewhat different from the other words mentioned. It often implies that the means used are the appointed channels for the conveyance of the object or advantage specified; as, I heard the news through such a person; I received a remittance through the bank."

With child: Pregnant; in the family way. "She was found with child of the Holy Ghost."—Matthew I. 18.

with, s. [WITHE.]

*with-ál, *with-áll, *with-alle, adv. & prep. [Eng. with and all. It has taken the place of A.S. mid ealle = with all, wholly.]

†wölds, †wöuids, s. [WELD.]

wölf, *wölf, *wöulfe (pl. wolves), s. [A.S. wulf (pl. wulfas); cogn. with Dut. & Ger. wolf; Icel. wölf (= wulf); Dan. ulv; Sw. ulf; Goth. wulfs; Russ. wölf; Gr. líkos (líkos); Lat. lupus; Sansc. wrika.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II. 3.

2. A small white maggot or worm which infests granaries.

3. A tubercular excrescence which rapidly eats away the flesh. [LUPUS.]

4. A term of opprobrium especially applied to a person noted for ravenousness, rapacity, cruelty, cunning, or the like. "Rescued in Orleans from the English wölves." Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI., I. 4.

II. Technically:

1. Cotton-manuf.: A beating or opening machine, for tearing apart the tassocks of cotton as delivered in the bale. It is a preliminary operation, by which dust and trash are rendered separate and the fibre delivered in a more downy condition, so as to subsequently form a lap.

†2. Music:

(1) A term applied to the harsh, howling sound of certain chorals of keyed instruments, particularly the organ, when tuned by any form of unequal temperament.

(2) A wolf-note (q.v.).

3. Zool.: Canis lupus, of which there are many varieties, by some authorities raised to specific rank, but the differences between them are slight and unimportant, and probably produced by climate and surroundings. The Common Wolf is about five feet from the snout to the tip of the tail, which is about twenty inches long; height at shoulder about thirty-two inches; hair dark yellowish-gray, sometimes almost black, long and coarse in the northern varieties, and shorter in those which are found in warm climates; tail drooping; ears upright and pointed; eyes set obliquely. The wolf is swift, and preys on sheep and calves, associating in packs to run down deer and other animals; rarely attacking man unless hard pressed by hunger, when it becomes very dangerous. The geographical range is very wide, and it is common in Europe, though it has been extinct in England since the end of the fifteenth century. The last wolf is said to have been killed in Scotland by Sir Ewen Cameron, in 1680, and wolves lingered in Ireland for at least thirty years later. Of the other varieties the chief are the Black Wolf of Southern Europe; the Indian Wolf (C. pallipes); the White Wolf (C. laniger) and a variety with black shaggy fur (C. aiger), from Tibet; the North American Wolf (C. occidentalis = Lupus griseus), differing chiefly from the Common Wolf in having finer, denser, and longer fur, and very broad feet, enabling it to travel easily over the snow; the White Wolf (Lupus albus), the Pied Wolf (L. alpestris), the Dusky Wolf (L. nubilus); and the Black Wolf (L. ater), all from North America.

†REP-WOLF. The Prairie-wolf, or Coyote (Canis latrans), found from Mexico northwards to the Saskatchewan, is probably a distinct species. It is much smaller than the Common Wolf, the body and head together measuring only about three feet, and the tail some fifteen inches; colour dull yellowish-gray, clouded with black. They hunt in packs, and can utter a short, snapping bark, while the only sound made by true wolves is a prolonged howl.

†I. Dark as a wolf's mouth (or throat): Pitch-dark.

2. To cry wolf: To raise a false alarm. In allusion to the shepherd-boy in the fable, who used to cry "Wolf!" merely to make fun of the neighbours, but when at last the wolf came no one would believe him.

3. To have a wolf by the ears: [See extract.] "He that deals with men's affections hath a wolf by the ears; if we speak of peace, they wax wanton; if we reprove, they grow desperate."—Adams: Works, II. 218.

4. To have a wolf in the stomach: To be ravenously hungry.

5. To keep the wolf from the door: To keep out or off hunger or want.

6. To see a wolf: To lose one's voice. The ancients used to say that if a man saw a wolf before the wolf saw him he became dumb, at least for a time. (Virgil, Ecl. ix.)

wölf-berry, s. Bot.: Symphoricarpos occidentalis. It is a shrub four to six feet high, with dense axillary spikes of drooping flowers; a native of Canada.

wölf-dog, s. Zoology:

1. A variety of Canis familiaris, used for hunting; formerly abundant in Norway and Sweden, but is now almost entirely confined to Spain. It is of large size, little, if any, smaller than the mastiff (q.v.), nose pointed, ears erect, hair long and silky, usually white, with large patches of brown; tail curled over the back.

2. A dog bred from a wolf and a common dog. The offspring are fertile inter se. (Vero Shaw.)

wölf-fish, s. [SEA-WOLF.]

*wolf-month, s. The Saxon name for January, because "people are wont always in that month to be in more danger of being devoured by wolves than in any other." (Versteegan.)

wolf-net, s. A kind of net used in fishing, which takes great numbers.

wolf-note, s. Music: A harsh sound occurring in string instruments owing to defective vibration on one or more notes of the scale.

"By a wrong arrangement of the sound-post or bass-bar what are called wolf-notes are produced, and when present they may generally be cured by the proper adjustment of the bar or post."—E. H. Allen: Violin Making, p. 146.

wolf-spider, s. Zool. (PL.): The Lycosidae (q.v.).

wolf's bane, s. Botany:

1. One of the names of the genus Aconitum, spec. of A. Napellus, A. Lycotomum, and A. lupulinum. (Fæston.)

2. Arctica montana. [ARNICA.]

3. Eranthis hyemalis. (Britten & Holland.)

wolf's claw, wolf's foot, s. Bot.: Club-moss, Lycopodium clavatum, a cryptogamous plant of the genus Lycopodium. So named from the claw-like ends of the trailing stem. (Prior.) wolf's fist, s. Bot.: Lycopodium Bootia.

wolf's foot, s. [WOLF'S CLAW.]

wolf's milk, s. Bot.: The genus Euphorbia, spec. E. Helioscopia. Probably named from the acrid qualities of the milk.

wolf's peach, s. Bot.: The Tomato (q.v.).

wölf, w. [WOLF, s.] To devour ravenously. "Wölfing down some food preparatory to fishing."—Field, April 4, 1888.

wöf-ach-ite, s. [After Wolfach, Baden, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral occurring in small crystals encrusting Nickelline (q.v.). Hardness, 5.5; sp. gr., 6.872; lustre, metallic; colour, silver to tin-white; streak, black. An analysis yielded: sulphur, 14.43; arsenic, 38.46; antimony, 13.17; lead, 1.82; silver, 0.12; iron, 3.71; nickel, 29.53. 100.74, which the same composition as the cubic Cornyrite (q.v.), so that the compound is dimorphous.

wölf-i-a, s. [Named after S. F. Wolf, a writer on the botanical genus Lemna.]

Bot.: A genus of Pistiaceae, akin to Lemna. Frond oblong or subglobose, cleft near the base, rootless, spathe none, flowers bursting through the frond, either one, sessile, one-celled, style short, utricle spheroidal, indelible, with one erect seed. Only known species, Wolfia arniza, found in ponds in England, parts of the European continent, and Western Africa.

wölf-i-an, Wolf-i-an, a. & s. [For etym. see def. and compound.]

A. As adj.: Of, belonging to, proposed, or discovered by any person of the name of Wolf or Wolf, especially those mentioned in the compounds (q.v.).

B. As subst.: An adherent or defender of the Wolfian philosophy. [WOLFIANISM.]

"The Wolfians had got hold of a sound principle only requiring limitation."—Wallace: Kant, p. 147.

Wolfian-bodies, s. pl. Comp. Anat.: Two important organs in the vertebrate embryo, serving the purpose of temporary kidneys, from which the true kidneys are developed, except in the Fishes. They consist of a series of blind appendages, secreting a fluid which is conveyed by a duct on each side into the allantois. In man the Wolfian bodies make their appearance towards the first month of embryonic life, decreasing about the beginning of the third month, the true kidneys increasing in a corresponding ratio.

Wolfian-theory or hypothesis, s. Historic criticism: A theory or hypothesis published by Friedrich August Wolf (1759-1824), the most distinguished German classical scholar of his time, in the Prolegomena to his second edition of Homer, sent forth in 1794 or 1795, to the effect that not merely were the Iliad and Odyssey composed by different poets, but that each of these compositions was put together from ballads preserved in the memory of itinerant minstrels or rhapsodists before writing was known in Greece, the poems taking their present form after writing was introduced in the sixth century a.c. Wolf's views attained to great celebrity, and an effort on the part of Heyna to claim priority in their discovery failed of effect. They not merely affected Homeric and other historic criticism permanently, but gave an impulse to the rationalistic treatment of Scripture which has not yet passed away. [CHORIZONTES.]

Wolf-i-an-ism, Wolf-i-an-ism, s. [Eng. Wolfian (1), Wolfian; -ism.]

Philos.: The system developed from Leibnizianism (q.v.), by Christian Wolff. [WOLFFIAN, A.] He appropriated the conceptions of Leibnitz, and, modifying them to some extent, brought them into nearer agreement with the ordinary conceptions of things. He denied perceptions to all monads which were not souls [MONAD, 1.], accepted the doctrine of pre-established harmony only as a permissible hypothesis, and refused to exclude the possibility of the interaction of soul and body. He divided metaphysics into ontology (treating of the existent in general), rational psychology (of the soul as a simple, non-extended substance), cosmology (dealing with the world as a whole), and rational theology (treating of the existence and attributes of God). His moral principle was the idea of perfection; and he taught that to labour for our own perfection and that of others is the law of our rational nature.

* The most influential opponent of Wolfianism. . . based ethics on the will of God as a lawgiver. — Cebers: Hist. Philos. (Eng. ed.), II. 117.

wolf'-ish, a. [Eng. wolf; -ish.]

1. Like a wolf; having the qualities or form of a wolf. "She'll stay thy wolfish visage." Shakesp.: Lear, I. 4.
2. Ravenously hungry. (Amer.) wolf'-ish-ly, adv. [Eng. wolfish; -ly.] In a wolfish manner; like a wolf.

* wolf'-kin, s. [Eng. wolf, s.; dimln. suff. -kin.] A young or small wolf.

* wolf'-ling, s. [Eng. wolf, s.; dimln. suff. -ling.] A young wolf.

* Wolfings. . . who would grow to be wolves. — Carlyle: Fr. Revol., pt. III., bk. v., ch. III.

wolf'-ram (1), wolf'-ram-ine (1), wolf'-ram-ite, s. [An ancient German miner's name, derived from the Lupi Spuma of Agricola (Foss. 255, 1546); suff. -ine, -ite (Min.); Fr. scheelin ferruginé.]

Min.: A mineral occurring mostly in tin-producing districts, sometimes in abundance, to the detriment of the tin ores. Crystallization, orthorhombic, but usually found lamellar, massive. Hardness, 5 to 5½; sp. gr. 7.1 to 7.55; lustre, submetallic; colour and streak, reddish-brown to black, opaque. Compos.: a tungstate of iron and manganese, the proportions of which are variable, and lead to differing formulae, though most can be represented by 2FeWO₃ + 3MnOWO₃, or 4FeWO₃ + MnOWO₃.

wolf'-ram (2), s. [TUNGSTEN.]

wolfram-ochre, s. [TUNGSTITE.]

wolf'-ram-ine, s. [Eng. wolfram (2), suff. -ine.]

Min.: Tungstic ochre (q.v.).

wolfs'-berg-ite, s. [After Wolfsberg, Hartz, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineralogy:

1. The same as CHALCOSTIBITE (q.v.).
2. Capillary and massive forms of Jamesonite (q.v.).

wolf'-skin, s. & a. [Eng. wolf, s., and skin.]

A. As subst.: The skin or hide of a wolf.

B. As adj.: Made of the skin of a wolf.

"In wolfskin vest
Here roving wild." Wordsworth: Sonnets.

Wol'-las-tôn, s. [WOLLASTONITE.] (See etym. and compounds.)

Wollaston's battery, s.

Elect.: A galvanic battery so arranged that all the plates can be at once lifted from the liquid in the cells so as to stop the action of the battery.

Wollaston's doublet, s.

Optical Instrum.: Two plano-convex lenses used in place of one very convergent lens in a microscope. The plane face of each lens is turned to the object.

Wollaston's prism, s.

Optical Instrum.: A camera lucida, slone or fitted to a microscope.

wol'-as-tôn-ite, s. [After the English chemist, W. H. Wollaston (1766-1828), the discoverer of palladium and rhodium; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineralogy:

1. A mineral belonging to the group of bicarbonates. Crystallization, monoclinic, though crystals are somewhat rare, the mineral occurring more frequently in masses with distinct cleavages. Hardness, 4.5 to 5; sp. gr. 2.78 to 2.9; lustre, vitreous; colour, white to gray. Compos.: silicea, 51.7; lime, 48.3 = 100, which yields the formula, CaOSiO₂. Good crystals are found in the old volcanic bombs of Monte Somma, Vesuvius, and occasionally in the granular limestone of Cziklowa, Hungary.
2. The same as PECTOLITE (q.v.).

wol'-ôn-gông'-ite, s. [After Wollongong, New South Wales, where it was stated to have been found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A name given to a bituminous shale occurring in cubical blocks without lamination. Liversidge refers it to Torbanite (q.v.).

wol'-nyn, s. [Etym. doubtful; prob. a Hungarian local name.]

Min.: A variety of Barite (q.v.) occurring in crystals lengthened in the direction of the vertical axis. First announced from Betler, Hungary.

wol'-vër-ène, wol'-vër-ine, s. [Formed from Eng. wolf (q.v.), from the exaggerated accounts of the ferocity of the animal.]

Zool.: Gulo luscus. [GLUTTON, II. 1.]

"In those vast and still unmapped wildernesses may be found the grey fox, the musk-ox, the musquash, the ermine, and the wolverine, of whom Mr. A. Peckarves Vivian, M.P., says that, although not bigger than a marten-cat, he is so ferocious as often to intimidate a bear. "The wolverine goes," says this experienced traveller, "by many local names—such as "skunk-bear," "corky-joe," and "go-for-dog"—and is rapidly becoming scarce in the more frequented regions. Hunters relate wonderful stories of his ferocity."—Daily Telegraph, May 8, 1888.

WOLVERINE.

"Although a wolish case he wears." Ben Jonson: Poetaster, c. 8.

wol'-yn'-ite, s. [After Volhynia, or Wolhynia, where found; suff. -ite (Petrol.).]

Petrol.: A name given to a rock consisting of a sperulitic oligoclase and acicular hornblende; enclosing, as accessory minerals, magnetite and pyrites.

wom'-an, * wim-man, * wim-mon, * wum-man, * wom-man (pl. *women, * wemen, * wymmen*), s. [A.S. wifman = a wife-man (pl. wifmen, wimmen). By assimilation wifman became wimman in the tenth century. Cf. lammas = A.S. hlafmorse; l-man = A.S. lofmann, &c. The change of vowel was due to the preceding w, as in A.S. wifw, later wudu = a wood.]

1. The female of the human race; an adult or grown up female, as distinguished from a girl. "The rib, which the Lord God had taken from the man, made her a woman."—Genesis II. 22.
2. A wife. (Shakesp.: 1 Henry IV., II. 3.)
3. A female attendant on a person of rank.

"Sir Thomas Bullen's daughter—
The Viscount Rochford—one of her brightest women"
Shakesp.: Henry VIII., v. 1.

4. Applied to a person of timid or cowardly disposition.

† 1. Woman of the world:

(1) A woman skilled in the ways of the world; one engrossed in society or fashionable society.

(2) A married woman. (Shakesp.: As You Like It, v. 8.)

2. To play (or act) the woman: To weep; to give way.

woman-warrior, s. A female warrior.

"Thou woman-warrior with the curling hair!" Keats: Homer's Iliad XL. 492.

woman-worship, s. Excessive reverence paid to women. It is closely connected with the worship of female divinities, which probably is a development from Nature-worship, in which the Earth was personified as a fruitful mother. Great reverence for women has always been a characteristic of the Teutonic nations, and was peculiarly prevalent in the ages of chivalry. Grimm (Deut. Myth., Eng. ed., I. 398) gives some remarkable formulae of chivalry ("by all women's honour," "for the sake of all women," &c.) in which this reverence is clearly shown.

"He thus becomes the type of the husbands of the Middle-Ages and of the woman-worship of chivalry. Woman-worship, 'the honour due to the weaker vessel' is indeed of God, and due to the nation and to the man in whom it dies."—C. Kingsley: Saints' Tragedy. (Introd.)

* wom'-an, v.t. [WOMAN, s.]

1. To act the part of a woman. (With an indefinite it.)

"My daughter Silvia, how she would have woman'd it." Daniel.

2. To cause to act like a woman; to subdue to weakness like a woman.

"I have felt so many quivers of joy and grief,
That the first face of neither, on the start,
Can woman me unto it." Shakesp.: All's Well, III. 2.

3. To unite to, or accompany by a woman.

"I do attend here on the general;
And think it no addition, nor my wish,
To have him see me woman'd." Shakesp.: Othello, III. 4.

4. To call woman in an abusive manner.

"She called her another fine fat-face, and woman'd her most violently."—Richardson: Pamela, I. 268.

"That caves and womb-y vaultages of France."
Shakespeare: Henry V., II, 4.

women (as wim'-mīn), s. pl. [WOMAN.]

women's rights, a. pl. The name given to the claims advanced on behalf of women who demand that their sex shall, as far as possible, be put on a footing of legal and social equality with men. The agitation for women's rights dates from the middle of the present century, and has been most active within the United States and Britain, in which countries its progress has been very considerable. Women claim the right of suffrage, on the ground that they pay taxes for their property, and have an equal claim with man to a voice in making the laws; they desire to share with men the higher educational opportunities, to enter trades and professions on the same terms with men, to have equal control of their property and children, and to have a voice in making the laws of marriage and divorce, which, they say, press with unequal severity upon them. Many of these demands have been accorded them, and it seems as if before many years all would be. As regards suffrage, in one of the states of this country, Wyoming, women have full suffrage, and in many of the states partial suffrage. In England they possess the municipal, and may soon gain the parliamentary suffrage.

womenkind (as wim'-mīn-kind), s. [Eng. women, and kind, a.] The same as WOMANKIND, 2. (q. v.)

"Nobody need fear to take his womenkind to the smallest and meanest of suburban towns."
—Reference, Aug. 29, 1886.

Chaucer: Legend of Good Women; Dido, l. 1185.

wōn-dēr, s., a. & adv. [A.S. wundor = a portent; cogn. with Dut. wonder; Icel. undr (for vundr); Dan. & Sw. wunder; O. H. Ger. wuntar; Ger. wunder. From the same root as A.S. windan = to wind, so that the original sense is awe, lit. that from which one turns aside, or that which is turned from.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Something which excites a feeling of surprise combined with admiration or awe; something strange, wonderful, or marvellous; a marvel, a miracle, a cause of wonder, a prodigy.

"Be you in the park about midnight, at Herve's oak, and you shall see wonders."
—Shakespeare: Merry Wives, v. 1.

2. That emotion which is excited by novelty, or the presentation to the mind or sight of something new, unusual, strange, great, extraordinary, not well understood, or inexplicable, or that arrests the attention by its novelty, grandeur, or inexplicableness. Wonder expresses less than astonishment, and much less than amazement.

"For my part I am so attired in wonder,
I know not what to say."
—Shakespeare: Much Ado, iv. 1.

¶ Darwin (Descent of Man, pt. i, ch. iii.) considers that all animals feel wonder.

3. Admiration.

"In silent wonder of still-gazing eyes."
Shakespeare: Rape of Lucrece, 84.

II. Phrenol.: One of the sentiments in the system of Spurzheim. It tends to make men eager to see whatever is wonderful, and to create belief in the supernatural. Its organ is situated on each side of the head, not far from the summit, between Ideality and Hope. Called also Marvellousness. [PHRENOLOOY.]

wón-dêr-flôw-êr, s. [Ger. wunderblume.]

Anthrop.: A popular name in Teutonic folk-tales for a flower endowed with miraculous power, especially with regard to the discovery of buried treasure. Grimm thinks that the name Forget-me-not applied to the Germaner Speedwell and Myosotis has reference to this supposed miraculous power, and that the "sentimental" explanation came later. (See extract)

"The folk-tales simply call it a beautiful wonder-flower, which the favoured person finds and sticks in his hat; all at once entrance and exit stand open for him to the treasure of the mountain. If inside the cavern he has filled his pockets, and bewildered at the sight of the valuables, had laid aside his hat, a warning voice rings in his ear as he departs. Forget not the best! . . . In a twinkling all has disappeared, and the road is never to be found again." Grimm: Deut. Mythol. (Eng. ed.), III. 971, 972.

I. Ordinary Language:1. Literally:

(1) A large and thick collection of growing trees; a forest.

From Badby I rode through some woods.—Pennant: Journey from Chester, p. 264.

(2) The substance of trees. [II. 1.]

(3) Timber; the trunks or main stems of trees which attain such dimensions as to be fit for architectural and other purposes. (In this sense the word denotes not only standing trees suitable for buildings, &c., but also such trees cut into beams, rafters, planks, &c. [TIMBER].)

* 2. Fig.: A crowded mass or collection of anything; a forest. (The Lat. silva = a wood, is used in the same manner.)

"A blaze of hucklers and a wood of spears."
Pope: Homer: Odyssey xxii. 161.

II. Technically:1. Art: [WOOD-ENRAVING].

2. Bot., Veget. Physiol., &c.: Botanists use the term wood in two senses: first, the portion of the stem and branches which intervenes between the pith and the bark, without reference to whether it is hard or soft; and second, the hard portion of the stem and branches of a tree or shrub, the soft substance existing in similar situations in an herb being denominated the pith. No wood exists in the embryo of an exogen, which at the outset consists wholly of cellular tissue. Soon after it has germinated, however, fine ligneous fibres descend from the cotyledons to the radicle, meeting in the centre of the embryo, and constituting a fine ligneous axis. Somewhat similarly, each leaf, after the tree or shrub has grown, sends down elaborated sap, which forms a layer, sheath, or ring of cambium inside the bark. [CAMBIUM.] The cambium layer generates fibro-vascular bundles, the inner portion being woody [XYLEM] and the outer portion less solid. [BAST, PHLOEM.] At first the bundles are separate from each other, but ultimately they unite and constitute a hollow cylinder around the central pith. This process continuing, especially in spring, new wood is added around the old, and being softer than that previously existing, is called albumen or sap-wood, the other being denominated duramen, or heart-wood (q.v.). The intermission of growth in winter leaves a circular mark on the stem, well seen in a cross section, thus giving rise to a series of annual zones. [ZONE.] Exogenous wood is traversed by medullary rays (q.v.). In woody endogens, such as palms, there is no proper cambium layer, nor is there a central pith, but the fibro-vascular bundles are separated from each other, and may be seen on a cross section scattered irregularly over the whole breadth of the stem, but more numerous, closer together, and harder near the circumference than towards the centre. In the stems of the woody acaenogens (Tree-ferns) there is a circle of fibro-vascular bundles not far from the exterior of the stem. The cross-section shews these to be, as a rule, united in pairs. [FOSSIL-WOOD, SILICIFIED-WOOD.]

¶ The preservation of the forests of the United States has been a much-noted question of recent years, the rapid felling of trees rendering it probable that the woodland would all disappear unless active measures were taken to preserve it. Many of the states now have Forestry Associations, and a National Forestry Congress has been held which did much to call attention to the importance of this subject. The turning point has perhaps been reached, and the rapid destruction of the woodland promises to be checked.

3. Her.: This same as HURST (q.v.).

4. Mus. (Pl.): That class of wind-instruments constructed of wood, ivory, or the like, the principal of which are the flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, &c., in contradistinction to the strings and brass.

(2) Drawn from the wood: Drawn from the cask. Applied to wines and beers which are supplied to the consumer direct from the cask.

(3) Wine in the wood: Wine in cask, as distinguished from wine bottled or decanted.

wood-baboon, s.

Zool.: Cynocephalus leucophaeus, allied to, but smaller than the Mandrill (q.v.). It is a native of the coast of Guinea; fur greenish, whitish beneath; callosities scarlet. Called also Cincereous Baboon, Drill, and Yellow Baboon.

wood-bird, s. A bird which lives in the woods.

"The wood-birds ceased from singing."
Longfellow: Hiawatha, vl.

wood-blade, s.

Bot.: Lusula sylvatica.

wood-boring, a. Capable of boring through wood.

Wood-boring shrimp:

Zool.: Chelura trebrans.

* wood-born, * wood-borne, c. Born in the woods.

"The wood-borne people fall before her fiat."
Spenser: F. Q., l. vi. 14.

wood-bound, a. Encumbered with tall, woody hedgerows.

wood-brick, s. [WOODEN-BRICK.]

wood-butterfly, s.

Entom.: The genus Lasiommata (q.v.).

wood-carpet, s. A floor-covering made of slats, or more ornamental shapes, glued or cemented upon a cloth backing. This has come into considerable use in large halls and similar places, and is made attractive by the variety of patterns produced by the use of woods of different shades of color and arranged to form various geometrical and other designs.

wood-carving, s.

1. The art or process of carving wood into ornamental figures or of decorating wood by carving on it.

2. A device or figure carved on or out of wood.

wood-cell, wood-fibre, s.

Bot.: A cell or fibre of the type Prosenchyma (q.v.). Such cells are always fusiform, thickened, lignified, unbranched, and as a rule, furnished with very small, bordered pits. Called also Libriform-cells. [Thomé.]

wood-charcoal, s. [CHARCOAL.]

* wood-choir, s. A chorus of birds in a wood. [Coleridge.]

wood-copper, s. [OLIVENTITE.]

wood-corn, s. A certain quantity of grain paid by the tenants of some manors to the lord, for the liberty of picking up dried or broken wood.

* wood-cracker, s.

Ornith.: (See extract.)

"He [Plot] writes (Nat. Hist. Oxfordsh., p. 176) of a bird 'sometimes seen, but oftener heard' in the Park at Woodstock, from the noise that it makes commonly called the Wood-cracker: described to me (for I had not the happiness to see it) to be about the bigness of a sparrow, with a blue back and a reddish breast, a wide mouth, and a long bill, which it puts into a crack or splinter of a rotten bough of a tree, and makes a noise as if it were reading aloud, with that violence, that the noise may be heard at least twelve score yards, some have ventured to say a mile, from this place! It will be seen that the bird described was a Nuthatch, but the noise was no doubt made by a woodpecker.—Yarrell: Brit. Birds (ed. 4th), ll. 47. (Note 1.)

wood-craft, s. [WOODCRAFT.]

wood-cricketer, s. [NEMOBIUS.]

wood-crowfoot, s.

Bot.: Anemone nemorosa. (Prior.)

wood-crowned, a. Crowned or surmounted by woods.

"The wood-crowned cliffs that o'er the lake recline."
Wordsworth: Descriptive Sketches.

wood-oliver, s. The wood-pigeon. (Prov.)

wood-out, s. An engraving on wood, or a print or impression from such engraving.

wood-cutter, s.

1. One who cuts wood or timber.

2. One who makes wood-cuts; an engraver on wood.

wood-cutting, s.

1. The act or employment of cutting wood or timber by means of saws or by the application of knife-edge machinery.

2. Wood-engraving (q.v.).

"It is vexatious to see much good wood-cutting bestowed on such poor and unexpressive drawings."
Pall Mall Gazette, Sept. 6, 1884.

wood-demon, s.

Anthrop.: A demon supposed to inhabit woods and to prey on travellers. [FOREST-SPIRITS.]

"The terrific cry of the wood-demon is heard in the Finland forest."
Taylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ll. 222.

wood-dove, s. The Wood-pigeon (q.v.).

wood-drink, s. A decoction or infusion of medicinal woods, as sassafras.

"The drinking elder-wine or wood-drinks are very useful."
Floper: On the Humours.

wood-duck, s. [SUMMER-DUCK.]

wood-engraver, s. An artist who engraves on wood.

wood-engraving, s. The art of engraving upon wood blocks for printing purposes. It is mainly employed in pictorial illustration, and has the advantage over engravings on copper and steel that the illustrations and letter-press can be set up and printed together. The blocks on which the engravings are made are prepared from box wood for all fine work, and from pear or other close-grained wood for larger work. A very fine surface is given to the block upon which the subject to be engraved is drawn or photographed. The work is executed by gravers of various shapes, the principle of the art being that the lines intended to appear when printed are left standing, all the white parts being cut away. In steel and copper-plate engraving the principle is reversed, the lines intended to appear being cut into the plate.

wood everlasting pea, s.

Bot.: Lathyrus sylvestris. Called also the Narrow-leaved Everlasting Pea. It has large, greenish flowers, with purple veins, and is found wild in the middle and south of England.

wood-fiend, s.

Anthrop.: A wood-demon (q.v.).

"The groups of malicious wood-fiends so obviously devised account for the mysterious influences that beset the forest wanderer."
Taylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ll. 222.

wood-fretter, s. An insect or worm that eats into wood.

wood-gas, s. Carburetted hydrogen obtained from wood.

wood-gear, s. Cog-wheels of wood; used sometimes in roughly-made cider mills and presses, &c., and formerly in clocks. Apple, pear, dog, and box wood are good timber for the purpose.

* wood-geld, s.

Law: The money paid for the cutting of wood within a forest.

wood-germander, s. The same as WOOD-SAGE (q.v.).

wood-gnat, s.

Entom.: Culex nemorosus, a British species.

b6ll, b6y; p6ut, j6w1; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing. -elan, -lian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -clous, -tiou, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

It frequents woods, but does not come into houses.

* wood-god, s. A sylvan deity.
* Wood-gods, and satyrs, and swift dryades.
Spenser: Virgil; Gnat.

wood-grass, s.

Bot.: (1) Sorghum, or Andropogon nutans; (2) Luzula sylvatica.

wood-grinder, s. A machine for rasping wooden blocks, to make paper-pulp. (WOOD-PAPER.)

wood-grouse, s. The Capercaillie (q.v.).

wood-hanging, s. Thin veneer on a paper backing, to be used as wall-paper. (Amer.)

wood-hen, s.

Ornith.: The genus Ocydromus (q.v.).

wood-hole, s. A place where wood is stored or laid up.

* *Confounded, to the dark recess I fly
Of wood-hole.* Philips: Todd.

wood-hoopoes, s. pl.

Ornith.: The genus Irisor, sometimes placed with the Upipidae, but, by some authorities, raised to the rank of a family, Irisoridae. There are twelve species, strictly confined to Africa, ranging from Abyssinia to the west coast, and south to Cape Colony. Bill curved; tail very long and strongly graduated; dark, metallic plumage, inclining more or less to black. They form a connecting link between the true Hoopoes and the Hornbills.

wood-house, s.

1. A house or shed in which wood is deposited and sheltered from the weather.

2. A house constructed of wood.

wood-humble-bee, s.

Entom.: Bombus lucorum.

wood-ibises, s. pl.

Ornith.: The genus Tantalus (q.v.).

wood-iron, s.

Min.: A variety of limonite (q.v.) having a structure resembling that of wood.

wood-laurel, s.

Bot.: Daphne laureola. (Prior.)

wood-layer, s.

Bot.: A young oak or other timber plant laid down among the hawthorn, whitethorn, or other smaller trees planted to make hedges.

* wood-leaf, s. A leaf gathered in the woods. (Shakesp.: Cymbeline, iv. 2.)

wood-lice, s. A family of terrestrial crustaceans (Oniscidae) of the order Isopoda. The body is oval and flattened, the head bears a long pair of antennae, a pair of lateral eyes and jaws. There are seven pairs of legs on the thorax and six on the abdomen. All live on land, in damp places, hiding during the day and seeking their food at night. There are in all about 18 genera and 250 species. They are vegetarian animals and do some damage in gardens.

wood-lily, s.

Bot.: Convallaria majalis, the Sweet-scented Lily of the Valley. (Prior.) (CONVALLARIA.)

wood-lock, s.

Naut.: A block in the scores of the sternpost to keep the rudder from lifting off its bearings.

wood-louse, s.

Zool.: Any species or individual of the family Oniscidae (q.v.). (ARMADILLO, 2.)

* wood-mell, s. Wadmall (q.v.).

wood-mite, s.

Zool. (Pl.): The family Oribatida.

* wood-monger, s. A wood-seller; a dealer in wood.

* One Smith, a wood-monger of Westminster.—Wotton: Remains, p. 547.

wood-moss, s. Moss growing on wood.

* wood-mote, s. The ancient name of the forest court, now the Court of Attachment, otherwise called the Forty-Days Court.

wood-mouse, s.

Zool.: Mus sylvaticus, the Long-tailed Field Mouse, common over the temperate parts of Europe and Asia. It is a little larger than the Common Mouse, with a proportionately longer tail; yellowish-brown on upper surface, whitish beneath.

wood-naphtha, s.

Chem.: The neutral crude distillate obtained from the products of the destructive distillation of wood. It contains from 75 to 85 per cent. of pure wood spirit, or methyl alcohol, 5 to 10 per cent. of acetone, with much smaller proportions of crotonal, aldehyde, hydrocarbon oils, and other substances that are but little known. In its most rectified condition it possesses a specific gravity of .830.

wood-nightshade, s. [WOODY-NIGHTSHADE.]

* wood-note, s. A wild or natural note, like that of a forest bird, as the wood-lark, thrush, or nightingale.

* Sweetest Shakespeare, Fancy's child, Warble his native wood-notes wild.
Milton: L'Allegro, 134.

wood-nut, s.

Bot.: Corylus Avellana. (HAZEL.)

wood-nymph, s.

1. Ornith.: A dryad (q.v.).

* The wood-nymphs decked with daisies trim.
Milton: Comus, 120.

2. Ornith. (Pl.): The genus Thalurania (q.v.).

* wood-offering, s. Wood burnt on the altar.

* We cast the lots for the wood-offering.—Neh. x. 34.

wood-oil, s. An oil produced by several Burmese trees, spec. by Dipterocarpus levis and D. turbinatus. [DIPTEROCARPUS-BALSAM.]

wood-opal, s.

Min.: An opal form of silica which has gradually replaced the organic structures of trees; a pseudomorph of a mineral after a vegetable structure.

wood-owl, s.

Ornith.: Any individual of the genus Syrnium (q.v.).

wood-paper, s. Paper made of wood reduced to a pulp by mechanical or chemical means; more usually by a combination of the two.

wood-pavement, s. Pavement composed of blocks of wood. Wood pavements have been laid down at various times during the present century, in many cities, and with varied degrees of success. They are now used to a considerable extent in Chicago, and in other cities and towns of this country and Europe. Success depends largely upon the kinds of wood used and the care with which they are laid. The wood is cut into round or hexagonal blocks, of proper length, and laid on end on a suitably prepared basis. The interstices are then filled with gravel, tar, or other preservative material. Where properly laid they have proved successful, and possess certain advantages not possessed by stone pavements.

wood-pea, s.

Bot.: Orobis tuberosus = Lathyrus macrorrhizus.

wood-pie, s. A name given to the great spotted woodpecker, Picus major.

wood-pigeon, s. [WOODPIGEON.]

wood-pile, s. A stack of wood piled up for fuel.

wood-rat, s.

Zool.: The genus Neotoma (q.v.). Neotoma floridana, the Common Wood-rat, is called also the Florida Rat. N. cinerea is the Bushy-tailed Wood Rat.

wood-reed, wood small-reed, s.

Bot.: Calamagrostis Epiglos. It is two to six feet high, with very long, flat, scabrid leaves, glaucous beneath, and panicles of purplish-brown flowers. [CALAMAGROSTIS.] So named to distinguish it from the Pool-reed, Phragmites communis.

wood-roof, wood-ruff, s. [WOODRUFF.]

wood-rush, s.

Bot.: The genus Luzula (q.v.).

wood-sage, s.

Bot.: Teucrium Scorodonia. It is one to two feet high, with oblong ovate, very much wrinkled leaves, green on both sides, and downy; inflorescence in one-sided lateral or terminal racemes of yellowish-white flowers. It is extremely bitter, and has been used as a substitute for hops. It is common in Great Britain in woods and dry stony places, and is found also on the European continent and in North Africa.

* wood-sale, s. The act of selling wood.

Wood-sale time: The time for selling wood.

* *A sort of rusty hib-moa eat
In wood-sale time to sell a copse by great.*
Sylvester: The Captives, p. 244.

wood-sandpiper, s.

Ornith.: Totanus glareola, a rare British visitor. It is about ten inches long; general plumage shades of brown above, spotted and barred with white; under surface grayish-white to white.

wood-sare, s. Cuckoo-spit (q.v.).

* The froth called wood-sare, being like a kind of spittle, is found upon herbs, as lavender and sage.—Ascon.

wood-screw, s. A metallic screw for carpenters' and joiners' use in securing pieces of work together.

* wood-sere, s. & a.

A. As subst.: The time when there is no sap in the tree.

* *From May to October leave cropping, for why,
In wood-sere, whatever thou croppest shall die.*
Tusser: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry.

B. As adj.: Spongy, loose.

* The soil . . . is a poor wood-sere land very natural for the production of oaks especially.—Aubrey: Miscell., p. 311.

wood-shock, s.

Zool.: [PEKAN, 2.]

wood-shrikes, s. pl. [PRIONOPIDÆ.]

wood-skin, s. A large canoe used by the Indians of Guiana, made from the bark of the purple-heart tree and the simari or locust tree. Some of these canoes are so large as to carry twenty to twenty-five persons. (Simmonds.)

wood-soot, s. Soot from burnt wood. It is useful as a manure.

wood-sorrel, * wood-sore, * wood-sour, * wood-sower, s.

Bot.: The genus Oxalis, spec. O. acetosella. (OXALIS.)

wood-speck, s.

Ornith.: A local name for a Woodpecker (q.v.).

* Of picus martius, the wood-speck, many kinds.—Bronne: Norfolk Birds.

wood-spirit, s. [METHYLIC-ALCOHOL.]

wood-spite, s.

Ornith.: A local name for a Woodpecker (q.v.).

* The tail consists of ten feathers only, as in Wood-spite.—Willughby: Ornithology (ed. Ray), p. 145.

wood-spurge, s.

Bot.: Euphorbia Characias, the Upright Red-spurge.

wood-stamp, s. An engraved or carved stamp formed of a block of wood, to impress figures or colours on fabrics.

wood-star, s.

Ornith.: A popular name for any Humming-bird of the genera Chatoceerus, Doricha, or Myrtis.

wood-stone, s.

Min.: A chert (q.v.) which has replaced wood.

wood-stops, s. pl.

Musiq.: Organ stops, the pipes of which are of wood.

wood-strawberry, s.

Bot.: Fragaria vesca. Called also Wild-strawberry. [FRAGARIA, STRAWBERRY.]

wood-swallow, s.

Ornith.: The same as SWALLOW-SHRIKE (q.v.). The Common Wood-swallow is Artamus sordidus.

wood-tar, s. Tar obtained from wood.

wood-tin, s.

Min.: A variety of Cassiterite (q.v.), with concentric and fibrous structure.

wood-vetch, s.

Bot.: Vicia sylvatica; a species with branched tendrils and white flowers with fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hêre, eamel, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sire, sir, marine; gô, pôt, er, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, ûnite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = é; ey = â; qu = kw.

blne veins. Found in Great Britain in rocky woods, but is rare.

wood-vine, s.

Bot.: Bryonia dioica.

wood-vinegar, s. [VINEGAR.]

wood-walker, s.

Zool.: A popular name for the genus Hylobates, of which it is a literal translation. [GIBBON, HYLOBATES.]

wood-warbler, s.

Ornithology:

† 1. The Wood-wren (q.v.).

2. (Pl.): [MNIOTILIDÆ.]

* wood-ward, s. A woodreeva, a forester.

wood-wasp, s.

Entom.: Vespa sylvestris. It builds an oval nest, which it suspends from the branch of a tree.

wood-witch, s.

Bot.: Phallus impudicus. [PHALLOS, 2.]

wood-work, s. Work formed of wood; that part of any structure which is composed of wood.

wood-worm, s. A worm that is bred in wood.

wood-wren, s.

Ornith.: Phylloscopus sibilatrix († Sylvia sylvicola), a summer visitant to Britain, often confounded with the Willow-wren (q.v.), from which, however, it may be distinguished by its larger wings, a broad streak of sulphur-yellow over the eye and ear-coverts, and its plumage, which is green above and white below. It differs, also, from most of the Warblers in eating neither fruit nor berries, but subsisting on insects or their larvæ. The nest is oval, domed, and placed on the ground; eggs six, transparent, white, thickly spotted with dark-purplish-brown.

wood (2), s. [WOAD.]

wood-waxen, s. [WOAD-WAXEN.]

wood (1), v.t. & i. [WOOD (1), 2.]

A. Transitive:

1. To supply with wood; to get in supplies of wood for.

"Our next employment was wooding and watering our squadron."—Amson: Voyages, bk. L, ch. v.

* 2. To hide or place in a wood.

"We landed, and faire and easily followed for a small time after them, who had wooded themselves we know not where."—Hackluyt: Voyages, bk. III, 259.

* B. Intrans.: To take in or get supplies of wood.

"Continued their wooding and watering till the sth."—Amson: Voyages, bk. III, ch. x.

* wood (2), * wode, v.i. [WOON, a.] To be or act as one mad; to rave.

"He starth and woodeth in his adventures."—Chaucer: G. T., l. 15, 996.

wood-bine, wood-bynd, * wood-bynde, s. [A.S. widebinde = ivy, because it binds or winds round trees.]

Botany:

1. The Honeysuckle (q.v.).

2. Polygonum convolvulus. It is one to four feet long, has an angular twining stem, and cordate sagittate leaves. Found in fields and waste places in Britain, and now quite generally domesticated in America.

† Gone where the woodbine twineth: Come up the spout [SPOUT, s., †]; departed; disappeared; met with failure. (U. S. Slang.)

wood-bür-ÿ-type, s. [Named from the inventor of the process, Mr. Woodbury, a London photographer.]

Photog.: A method of obtaining permanent impressions from a photograph. A film of bichromatized gelatine on a sheet of glass is exposed under a photographic negative, and the portion unacted upon by the light washed away with water, leaving the printed parts in relief. After drying it is laid on a perfectly flat metallic plate, and a sheet of lead pressed down upon it by a powerful press, an exact mould being thus obtained. A viscous solution of gelatine mixed with a small proportion of a pigment or dye is next poured over the mould, and a sheet of strongly sized paper placed on top and firmly squeezed. On carefully removing the paper a perfect impression is obtained, and this is fixed by immersing in a strong solution of alum. Any number of copies may be obtained from the same mould.

wood'-ghât, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and chat.]

Ornith.: Lanius auriculatus, an African Shrike, ranging from the Mediterranean to the Cape of Good Hope, and visiting Europe, and occasionally Britain, in the summer. This popular name is misleading as the bird has no affinity with the Chats, and to avoid confusion some authors call it the Woodchat-shrike. Length rather more than seven inches; upper parts mostly black, crown of head and nape chestnut-red, outer tail feathers, spots on wings, streak above the base of bill on each side, and under surface white.

woodchat-shrike, s. [WOODCHAT.]

wood'-chûck, s. [Eng. wood; second element doubtful.]

Zool.: Arctomys monax, a small American burrowing rodent, ranging from the Carolinas to Hudson's Bay, and westward from the Atlantic coast to Missouri, Iowa, and Minnesota. Length from fifteen to eighteen inches; blackish or grizzled on upper surface, chestnut-red below; body stout, head broad, and flat, legs short and thick. The Woodchuck is a vegetable feeder, and may be easily tamed. Called also the Ground-hog.

WOODCHUCK.

wood'-oâl, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and coal.]

Charcoal; also lignite or brown-coal.

wood'-oôk, s. [A.S. wuduoc.]

1. Ornith.: Scelopax rusticola (the rusticola of Linnaeus is a misprint; cf. Pliny: N. H., x. 54, in some editions 38); distributed over Europe, the north of Asia, and as far East as Japan, but not found in the United States or any part of North America, where it is replaced by a woodcock of different genus. The Woodcock is about thirteen inches long; upper surface varied with ruddy, yellowish, and ash tints, and marked with great black spots; lower parts yellowish-red with brown zigzags; quills striped with red and black on their external barbs, tail-feathers terminated above with gray and below with white. The female is rather larger and stouter than the male. One of the most interesting traits about the Woodcock is the fact of its occasionally conveying its young through the air; which is done by only one or two other birds. The fact was known in the middle of the eighteenth century; but White (lett. xxl, to Pennaët) rightly surmised that Scopoli erred in supposing that the young one was conveyed either by or in the bill. It is just as erroneous, however, to substitute the claws, as some have done, for the bill. When the parent bird wishes to convey her young one from a place of danger to one of safety, the tiny thing is gently pressed between the feet and against the breast, the side of the bill only being resorted to when the burden has been hastily taken up. The American Woodcock, Philohela minor, is a smaller bird, but resembles the European species in plumage and habit, and, like it, is esteemed for the table.

2. Zool.: A collector's name for some species of the genus Murex (q.v.), from the resemblance of the spines or the elongated tube to the bill of the Woodcock. Murex tenuispina is the Thorny Woodcock, and M. haustellum the Woodcock's (or Snipe's) Nest.

3. Fig.: A simoleon; in allusion to the ease with which a woodcock allows itself to be taken in springs or nets set in the glades.

"But if I knew when you come next a hurding," I have a stronger noose to hold the woodcock."—Beaum. & Flct.: Scornful Lady, iv.

† Springs to catch woodcocks: Arts to entrap simplicity. (Shakesp.: Hamlet, i. 3.)

woodcock-eye, s. A name for a snap-book.

woodcock-fish, s.

Ichthy.: Centriscus scopax, the Trumpet-fish. Sir Thomas Browne (Of Fishes, &c.) calls it a Sea-woodcock.

woodcock-owl, s.

Ornith.: Asio accipitrinus († Otus brachyotus), the Short-eared Owl.

"A large proportion of the examples seen in this country are winter visitors that come from the north of Europe in October, and have in consequence been called Woodcock-owls."—Farrall: Brit. Birds (ed. 4th), i. 153.

woodcock-pilot, s.

Ornith.: Regulus cristatus. [GOLDEN-CRESTED WREN.]

"The migrating bodies are usually preceded by flocks of tiny goldcrests; and so invariable is this rule that the latter have come to be called 'woodcock-pilots.'"—St. James's Gazette, Mar. 14, 1857.

woodcock-shell, s. [WOODCOCK, 2.]

* woodcock's head, s. A tobacco pipe, from the fact that the early English pipes were often made in that form.

"I have not the breath of a woodcock's head."—Ben Jonson: Every Man out of his Humour, iii. 2.

wood'-craft, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and craft.]

1. Arboriculture; scientific forestry.

"I know this may have been done in Germany, where woodcraft is a science; but I have never heard of its having been even suggested in England."—St. James's Gazette, May 25, 1856.

2. Skill in anything which pertains to the woods or forest; skill in the chase, especially in hunting deer, finding a track through a forest, &c.

"I do not know what we should have done without the handy Indian woodcraft of the guides, which now came greatly to the rescue."—Scribner's Magazine, Aug. 1877, p. 800.

wood'-ëd, a. [Eng. wood (1), s.; -ed.]

1. Lit.: Supplied or covered with wood.

"Remote among the wooded hills."—Longfellow: Tales of a Wayside Inn. (Frol.)

* 2. Fig.: Crowded; thick as trees in a wood.

"The hills are wooded with their partisans."—Beaum. & Flct.: Boudicca, l. 2.

wood'-en (1), * wod'-den, a. [Eng. wood (1), s.; -en.]

1. Lit.: Made of wood; consisting or composed of wood.

"They wear their hair tied on the top like a wreath of hay, and put a wooden pin within it, or any other such thing instead of a nail."—Bauckley: Voyages, p. 203.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Stiff, ungainly, clumsy, awkward.

"When a bold man is out of countenance, he makes a very wooden figure on it."—Catler: On Confidence.

wooden-wall, s. The side of a ship; hence, a ship itself.

¶ When Athens was in imminent danger from the Persians, 483 B.C., during the invasion of Xerxes, the oracle at Delphi was consulted, and intimating that the city and country were doomed to ruin, added that—when all was lost, a wooden wall should still shelter her citizens. The Athenian young men interpreted "a wooden wall" to signify ships; Themistocles, who had probably influenced the oracle to utter the prediction or counsel it had given, was of the same opinion; faith was put in the asy, and the result was the great victory of Salamis. It was from this incident that the expression, "The wooden walls of England," arose.

wooden-ware, s. A specific term for vessels, such as bowls, platters, spoons, butter-prints, &c. turned from wood; wooden articles of merchandise.

wooden-wedge, s. [WEDGE (2), s.]

wooden-wing, s.

Naut.: A lee-board.

* wood'-en (2), a. [Eng. wood, s.; -en.] Mad.

In a wooden manner; clumsily, stiffly, stupidly.

"How woodenly he would excuse himself."—North: Life of Lord Guilford, ll. 22.

† wood'-en-ness, s. [Eng. wooden (1); -ness.]

Want of spirit or expression; clumsiness, awkwardness.

"One of them has produced more wooden pages than all other living writers (of the same rank) put together; but fortunately the woodenness does little or no harm."—Contemporary Review, April, 1871, p. 94.

* wood'-fall, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and fall, s.]

A fall or cutting of timber.

"The woodfalls this year do not amount to half the sum."—Bacon.

wood-for'-di-a, s. [Named after J. Woodford, who wrote an account of the plants round Edinburgh in 1824.]

Bot.: A genus of Lythraceae, now separated from Grisleia, of which it was formerly considered a synonym. Woodfordia (Grisleia tomentosa or floribunda, common in India, has a much-branched stem, sessile lanceolate leaves, covered beneath with white down, and axillary cymes of beautiful scarlet or purple flowers in immense profusion. It yields a gum like gum-tragacanth. The flowers, with alum for a mordant, give a red dye, occasionally used in India for silk. The leaves and flowers, together with the bark of Zizyphus xylopyra, are employed in tanning. Medicinally the dried flowers are stimulant and astringent; they are used by Hindoo doctors simply in bowel complaints, with curdled milk in dysentery, and with honey in menorrhagia, also as an external application in hæmorrhages and in ulcers.

* wood'-head, * wode-hede, s. [Eng. wood, s.; -head.]

Madness, fury.

"Lucifer tel for his woodhede."—Bampole: Psalms.

wood'-hew-er (ew as ū), s. [Eng. wood, s., and hewer.]

Ornithology:

1. A popular name for the genus Xiphocolaptes (q.v.). Xiphocolaptes emigrans is the Northern Woodhewer.

2. (Pl.): The sub-family Dendrocolaptinae (q.v.).

wood'-ie, wūd'-dŷ, s. [Wood, s., or, perhaps, a corruption of woide (q.v.).] The gal- lows; also a withe, or rope of twisted wands, in which misfactors seem formerly to have been hanged.

woodland-caribou, s.

Zool.: A large variety of Tarandus rangifer. It is confined to the southern and more woody parts of the fur countries of North America. (CARIBOU, REINDEER.)

* wood'-land-er, s. [Eng. woodland; -er.]

A dweller in the woodlands.

"Friend and fellow woodlander."—Kate: Emrysion, ll. 54.

wood'-lark, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and lark.]

Ornith.: Alauda arboræ, differing chiefly from the Skylark (q.v.) in its smaller size, its shorter tail, more distinctly marked breast, and a conspicuous light-coloured streak extending over each eye and the ear-coverts. It is locally distributed in England, occurring chiefly in East Anglia, migrating southward in winter; rare in Scotland, and a winter visitant to Ireland. Its note has neither the power nor variety of the Skylark, but is superior in quality of tone and is longer in duration. The nest is composed of grasses, moss, and hair, placed on the ground; eggs usually four or five, white covered with little red-brown spots.

"High in air, and pole'd upon his wings Unseen, the soft enamour'd Woodlark sings."—Gilbert White: Naturalist's Summer-Evening Walk.

* wood'-less, a. [Eng. wood (1), s.; -less.]

Destitute of woods; without timber.

"Arable and woody and . . . woodless land."—Puller: Worthies; Norfolk, ll. 124.

wood'-man, † wood's-man, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and man.]

1. A forest officer appointed to take care of the king's woods; a forester.

2. A sportsman, a hunter.

"He's a better woodman than thou takest him for."—Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, iv. 3.

3. One who lives in the woods.

"They lend a certain domestic charm to the lonely hut that makes the solitary woodman feel he is not alone."—Scribner's Magazine, August, 1877, p. 423.

4. One who fells timber; a wood-cutter.

"Thou woodman and forrager both, see thou neither cut nor lop trees."—P. Holland: Plinie, bk. xviii, ch. xxxiii.

* wood'-ness, * wode-nes, * wed-nesse, * wood-nesse, s. [Eng. wood, s.; -ness.]

Madness, fury, passion, anger.

"His fortune turned his wrath into woodnes."—Brende: Quintus Curtius, fol. 9.

* wood'-peck, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and peck, v.]

The woodpecker (q.v.).

"Nor woodpecks nor the swallow harbour near."—Addison: Virgil: Georgic iv. 19.

wood'-peck-er, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and pecker.]

Ornith.: The popular name of the old Linnean genus Picus, now greatly divided. Woodpeckers have a slender body, powerful beak, and protrusile tongue, which is sharp, barbed, and pointed, and covered with a glutinous secretion derived from glands in the throat, this coating being renewed every time the tongue is drawn within the bill. The tail is stiff, and serves as a support when the birds are clinging to the branches or stems of trees. The plumage is generally of strongly contrasted colours, black and white, or green and yellow, with red marks about the head. Woodpeckers are very widely distributed, but abound chiefly in warm climates. They are solitary in habit, and live in the depths of forests. Fruits, seeds, and insects constitute their food, and in pursuit of the latter they exhibit wonderful dexterity, climbing with astonishing quickness on the trunks and branches of trees, and when, by tapping with their bills, a rotten place has been discovered, they dig vigorously in search of the grubs or larvae beneath the bark. The common notion that they are injurious to trees is erroneous, as they do more good by preventing the ravages of insects than harm by their pecking. They roost and breed in hollow trunks, or holes in trees, enlarged by their strong, sharp bills; the eggs, which are white, smooth, and glossy, vary considerably in number, and are deposited on a bed of chips at the bottom of the hole. There are numerous American species, including the Flickers of the United States, the South American Ground Flickers, and the great Ivory-billed Woodpecker of the Southern States.

wood'-pig'-oon, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and pigeon.]

Ornithology:

1. Columba palumbus, a well-known bird common in the British Isles and distributed generally over Europe. Length about seventeen or eighteen inches; head, chin, and part of neck blue-gray, rest of neck and breast purple-red; bare skin at base of bill nearly white; feathers on side of neck tipped with white so as to form portions of oblique rings; upper parts and wings slaty bluish-gray; plumage of head less brilliant. Varieties more or less spotted with white often occur, and perfect albinos are sometimes met with. The food of the Woodpigeon consists of corn and grain, beechmast, peas, tares, acorns, the young shoots of turnip-tops, and spring-sown corn; and, as these birds make no return to the farmer by destroying his insect foes, their rapid increase is a source of grave anxiety to agriculturists. The nest of the Woodpigeon is a mere platform of loose sticks, so carelessly constructed that eggs and young birds are often blown therefrom and destroyed. The eggs are always two in number, white and oval; two and sometimes three broods are produced in the year. The ordinary flight is very strong and rapid, and, if disturbed, the bird springs into the air with a peculiar flapping of the wings, which may be heard at a considerable distance.

* 2. Columba ænas.

"As to the wild woodpigeon, the Ænas, or Vinago, of Ray, I am much of your mind; and see no reason for making it the origin of the common house dove; but suppose those that have advanced that opinion may have been misled by another appellation often given to the Ænas, which is that of stock-dove."—White: Selborne, lett. xlv. (To Pennant).

wood'-reeve, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and reeve.]

A steward or overseer of a wood.

"But there was no woodreeve in the House of Commons, and so the English woods were voted to destruction."—St. James's Gazette, May 25, 1866.

wood'-röck, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and rock.]

A name for ligniform asbestos.

wood'-rüff, † wood'-roste, † wood'-row-el * wood'-ruffe, s. [A.S. wudrofe, wudrofe = Asperula odorata, &c.; wofe doubtful.]

Probably the reference is to the ruff round the stem formed by the verticillate leaves.

Bot.: The genus Asperula (q.v.) and especially the Sweet Woodruff, Asperula odorata.

It is highly fragrant when dried, and is considered a diuretic. Another species, A. cynanchina, is somewhat astringent.

wood'-si-a, s. [Named after Joseph Woods (1776-1864) author of The Tourist's Flora.]

Bot.: A genus of Polyopodæ. Ferns with pinnate fronds, scattered, roundish sori, having beneath them a cup-shaped involucre, ultimately cut at the edge into many often capillary segments. Known species fourteen; from the eastern hemisphere and North America. Two of them are, Woodusa hyperborea, the Round-leaved, and W. idensis, the Oblong Woodsia. The first has a linear, lanceolate, pinnate frond, with few broad, ovate, cordate, entire lobes; the second a broadly-lanceolate frond, with many ovate-oblong, obtuse, deeply-pinnatifid lobes. Both are Alpine ferns.

† wood's-man, s. [WOODMAN.]

† wood'-snipe, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and snipe.]

Ornith.: An old English name for the Woodcock, to distinguish it from the Common Snipe. [SNIPES, s.]

"Feeling woodcocks was at one time the common way of taking them; for they have always been highly esteemed as food. Another method of capture was by 'gins' and 'springs'; and it would seem that in times past the 'woodcock' was considered a staple bird."—St. James's Gazette, March 14, 1887.

woods-y, a. [Eng. woods, pl. of wood (1), s.; -y.] Belonging to or associated with woods. (Amer.)

wood-wal, woodc-wals, wude-walc, wud-wal, s. [For etym. and def. see extract under WHITTLE.]

wool, wol, wolle, wulle, woule, s. [A.S. will, wil; cogn. with Dut. wol; lecl. ull (for vull); Dan. uld; Sw. ull; O. H. Ger. ulla; Ger. wolle; Goth. wulla; Lith. wilna; Russ. wolna; Sansc. úrva = wool; Lat. villus = shaggy hair; vellus = a fleece; Gr. épov, elpos (erion, civros) = wool.]

1. The fleece of the sheep; the soft hair which grows on sheep and some other animals, as the alpaca, the vicugna, some species of goats, &c., which in fineness somewhat approaches to fur. The distinction between wool and hair is not radical, one being but a modification of the other. Wool is softer, more curled and twisted, and more flexible than hair, and possesses in a much greater degree the remarkable property of felting. The wool of the same animal differs much on the various parts of the body: that on the neck, shoulders, and sides is the best. According to its quality wool is divided into different sorts, which receive different names. A threefold classification into primes, seconds, and thirds is pretty general in this country; but sometimes the wool of a single fleece is divided into as many as ten sorts. Wool is also divided into two classes, known as short or carding wool, which seldom exceeds three or four inches in length, and long or combing wool, varying in length from four to eight inches. The finest wools are of short staple, and the coarser wools usually of long staple. English-bred sheep produce a good, strong combing wool, that of the Scotch breed is somewhat harsher and coarser. The Saxon merinos have long been considered the most valuable in point of fineness of fibre. The wool of the alpaca is superior to the wool of English sheep in length, softness, and pliability, and is used for many purposes for which silk was formerly used. The wool of the llama is shorter and more rough. The chief supply of imported wool for manufacturing purposes is obtained from Australia, South America, and some European countries.

2. Less strictly applied to some other kinds of hair, and especially to short, thick hair, crisp and curled, like the hair of a negro.

"In the cauldron boil and bake; Eye of newt and toe of frog, Wool of bat and tongue of dog."—Shakspeare: Macbeth, IV, 1.

3. Any fibrous or fleecy substance resembling wool; specifically

(1) In Bot.: A term sometimes applied to fine vegetable fibre such as is found within a seed-vessel. [WOOLLY.]

(2) Metall.: A slag of iron blown by steam into a fibrous form.

(3) The raw material [1.] spun into a yarn or thread, and used for knitting or needlework. [1.]

"(1) Fancy wool: The name given to the varieties of wool used for fancy articles of dress or house decoration. The chief kinds are: Berlin wool, double and single, used chiefly for woolwork (q.v.); fleecy wools; Scotch fingering, for knitting socks and stockings; Shetland wool, fine and tightly twisted; Pyrenean and Zephyr wool.

(2) Great cry and little wool: Great noise and disturbance out of all proportion to useful results; much ado about nothing.

"Of thine own importance full Exclaim, 'Great cry and little wool!'"—Wolcott: P. Pindar, p. 126.

wool-ball, s. A ball or mass of wool; specifically, a small ball of wool found frequently in the stomachs of sheep and other wool-bearing animals.

wool-bearing, a. Producing wool.

wool-burler, s. A person who removes the burrs or little knots from wool or woollen cloth.

wool-burring, s. The act of teasing wool with burrs or tessels.

wool-carder, s. One who cards wool.

wool-carding, s. An early process in woollen manufacture for disentangling or tearing apart the tussocks of wool, and laying the fibres parallel, preparatory to spinning. It is only the short staple wools that are submitted to this operation, the long staple wools being combed.

wool-comber, s. One whose occupation is to comb wool.

"Half a dozen wool-combers, perhaps, are necessary to keep a thousand spinners and weavers at work."—Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. I, ch. x.

wool-combing, s. The act or process of combing wool, generally of the long stapled kind, for the purpose of worsted manufacture. The wool-combing machine separates the long from the short fibres of the wool. The long fibres are also laid in regular order, so that they can be readily spun into yarn. Lister's apparatus clears the long fibres by drawing them through a series of teeth by means of a nipper. A pair of jaws seizes a mouthful of wool, and conveys it into a carrier, which, in its turn, deposits upon the comb a brush, pressing it down on the teeth to a proper depth. Having cleared one end of the staple, it transfers the uncleaned end to the rotating comb, from which it is extracted by drawing-rollers. The noils are removed from the comb by another set of rollers. The long, cleared wool is delivered in a continuous sliver from the machine at one point, the noil being passed away at another.

wool-driver, s. One who buys wool and carries it to market.

wool-dyed, a. Dyed in the form of wool or yarn before being made into cloth.

wool-gathering, s. The act of gathering wool; now applied proverbially or figuratively to the indulgence of idle fancies; a foolish or fruitless pursuit. The allusion is probably to the practice of gathering the tufts of wool to be found on shrubs, hedges, &c., which necessitates much wandering about with little result.

"His wits were a wool-gathering as they say."—Burton: Anatomy of Melancholy, pt. I, § 2.

wool-grower, s. A person who breeds sheep for the production of wool.

wool-growing, s. The business of breeding sheep for the production of wool.

wool-hall, s. A trade market in the woollen districts. (Simmonds.)

wool-man, s. A dealer in wool.

wool-mill, s. A mill or factory for manufacturing wool and woollen cloth.

wool-moter, s. A person employed in picking wool and freeing it from lumps of shutek and other impurities. (Simmonds.)

2. The fibre or pile of wool. [STAPLE.]

wool-stapler, s.

1. A dealer in wool.

2. A wool-sorter (q.v.).

wool-thistle, s.

Bot.: Carduus eriophorus (Britten & Holland). Stem much branched, furrowed, two feet high; leaves semi-amplexical, but not decurrent, white and cottony, white beneath, pinnatifid, spinous and hairy, head very large, woolly, involucre globose; flowers pale purple, anthers blue. Found in England, but local; young parts cooked and eaten as salad. Called also the Woolly-headed Thistle.

wool-tree, s.

Bot.: The genus Eriodendron (q.v.).

wool-winder, s. A person employed to wind or make up wool into bundles to be packed for sale.

woold, v.t. [Dut. woolen = to wind, to wrap.]

Naut.: To wrap; particularly to wind a rope round a mast or yard when made of two or more pieces, at the place where they are fished, for the purpose of confining and supporting them.

woold, s. [WELD (1).]

woold'-er, s. [Eng. woold; -er.]

1. Naut.: A stick used for tightly winding a rope round another object, as in fishing a spar.

2. Rope-making: One of the handles of the top. [TOP, s., II. 3.]

woold'-ing, pa. par., a., & s. [WOOLD, v.]

A. & B. As pa. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As substantive:

1. The act of winding, as a rope, round a mast.

2. A rope used for binding masts and spars.

wool'-en, &c. [WOOLLEN, &c.]

* wool'-fel, s. [Eng. wool, and fell, s.] A skin or fell with the wool; a skin from which the wool has not been removed.

"Wool and woolfels are ever of little value in this kingdom."—Darwin: On Ireland.

* wool'-fist, s. [Eng. wool, and fist.] A term of reproach. Nares suggests that it may have originally meant sheep-stealer, or purloiner of wool.

"Out, you sons'd garnet, you woolfel / begone, I say."—Prod. to Wily Beguiled.

Wool'-hope, s. [See def.]

Geog.: A valley near Hereford, England.

Woolhope-limestone and shale, s.

Geol.: The lowest calcareous member of the Upper Silurian Rocks, largely developed at Woolhope, and found also on the western flanks of the Malvern Hills and May Hill, near Gloucester, at Walsall and Great Bar in Staffordshire, and in Radnorshire. It contains remains of twenty-five species of fossil Crustacea, chiefly Trilobites, fifty-nine Brachiopods, eight Gasteropods, three Pteropods, and three Cephalopods. (Etheridge.)

woolled, a. [Eng. wool; -ed.] Having wool. Used in composition, as a fine-woolled sheep.

wool'-lén, * wool'-én, * wol-len, a. & s. [A.S. wyllen, from wul, wull = wool.]

A. As adjective:

1. Made of wool; consisting of wool.

"The woolen coat . . . which covers the day labourer."—Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. I, ch. I.

2. Pertaining to wool.

* 3. Clad in the rough, homespun serges of former times, as opposed to the silk, velvet, and fine linen of the wealthier classes; hence, coarse, boorish, rustic, vulgar.

"Woolen vassals, things created To hay and sell with goats."—Shakespeare: Coriolanus, III. 2.

B. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: Cloth made of wool, such as blanketings, serges, flannels, tweeds, broad-cloth, and the like.

"The best woolens are sold a third cheaper."—Daily Telegraph, Dec. 4, 1857.

2. Bot.: Verbascum Thapsus. [VERBASCUM.]

¶ Buried in woolen: [FLANNEL, A. I. 3.]

woollen-drawer, s. A retail dealer in woolen cloth, flannels, and the like.

woollen-manufacture, s. The act of forming wool into cloth and stuff. The fabrics woven from short wools are distinctively called woollens; those from long wools are termed worsteds. [WORSTED.] The manufacture of cloth was known to the ancient Greeks, Romans, the Hindoos, the Jews, &c. (Lev. xiii. 47, 48, xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 11), but among these people it was chiefly a domestic manufacture. In all probability the Romans first introduced it into Britain. There is little historic mention of it before the thirteenth century. Edward III. improved the manufacture by inviting over Flemings, who were more skilful in it than the English of that time. During subsequent centuries unwise legislation, such as limiting the industry to particular towns, retarded its progress; besides which it was hampered by enactments equally unenlightened regarding wool. [WOOL, ¶.] It has now become one of the leading industries of England, and has attained a great development in the United States, in which country, in addition to the home supply of wool, 103,000,000 pounds were imported in 1890, for use in manufacture. The wool produced in the United States in the same year was about 270,000,000 pounds. In addition to the home manufacture, woollen goods were imported to the value of over $40,000,000.

woollen-printer, s. A workman who impresses patterns or colours on woollen or mixed fabrics.

woollen-scribbler, s. A machine for combing or preparing wool into thin, downy, translucent layers, preparatory to spinning. (Simmonds.)

wool'-lén-étte', s. [Eng. woollen; dimin. suff. -ette.]

Fabric: A thin woollen stuff.

wool'-li-néss, s. [Eng. woolly; -ness.] The quality or state of being woolly.

wool'-ly, a. [Eng. wool; -ly.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Consisting of wool.

"The warm and woolly fleece that cloth'd her murderer."—Dryden: Ovid; Metam. xv.

2. Resembling wool.

¶ Woolwich and Reading Beds:

Geol.: A series of Lower Eocene beds formerly called the Plastic Clay (q.v.). With the exception of the Thanet Sands (q.v.), they are the oldest English Tertiary. They occur in England both in the London and Hampshire basins, the Thanet Sands underlying them in the former, but being absent from the latter area. In the London basin they are seen chiefly at Blackheath, Woolwich, and Reading. The strata consist of mottled clays and sand with lignite, and one horizon contains fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pôr, er, wôre, wôlf, wôrck, whô, sôn; mûte, oûb, oûre, ûnite, oûr, rûle, fûll; try, Sÿrian. se, ce = ô; ey = â; qu = kw.

rolled flint pebbles derived from the chalk. The Woolwich and Reading beds are of freshwater, estuarine, and marine origin. An Eocene river flowed from the south-west into the Thames at Woolwich, having in it various shells, Unio, Paludina, Cyrena, &c., with plant remains of Ficus, Laurus, &c. In the lowest beds, which are more marine, banks of Oysters (Ostrea bellerophon) occur. The fauna comprises 72 genera and 129 species. Among them are turtles and a mammal (Coryphodon). The Plastic clay exists in the Paris basin, with the same remains.

Shaksp.: Othello, III. 2.

6. An industrial or manufacturing establishment; an establishment where labour is carried on extensively or in different departments; a factory. (Generally in the plural: as, gas-works, iron-works, &c.)

* 7. Manner of working; management, treatment.

"It is pleasant to see what work our adversaries make with this innocent canon."—Stillinger.

II. Technically:

1. Mech.: The overcoming of resistance; the result of one force overcoming another; the act of producing a change of configuration in a system in opposition to a force which resists that change. In England the unit of work is taken as a weight of one pound lifted one foot.

"In all cases in which we are accustomed to speak of work being done—whether by men, horse-power, or steam-power, and however various the products may be in different cases—the physical part of the process consists solely in producing or changing motion, or in keeping up motion in opposition to resistance, or in a combination of these actions."—Atkinson: Ganot; Physics, § 60.

2. Min.: Ores before they are cleaned or dressed.

3. Script. & Theol.: In Rom. xi. 6, work is used in the singular as opposed to grace; much more frequently the term is plural (works), and often constitutes an antithesis to faith (Rom. III. 27). Sometimes the expression is "the works of the law" (Rom. IX. 32), also "dead works," which require to be repented of (Heb. VI. 1, IX. 14). A fundamental distinction is drawn between the works of the flesh (Gal. V. 19-21) and the fruit of the spirit (22-23). The Protestant doctrine is, that man is justified by faith made manifest by works (Rom. III. 28, cf. James I. 17-26) but is judged by works (Matt. XVI. 27; xxv. 31-46), those which are the fruit of faith being acceptable to God (Rom. VI. 1-23, VIII. 1-4; Heb. XI. 5), those not having this origin being unacceptable (Heb. XI. 6). Cf. the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth of the Thirty-nine Articles, the Confession of Faith, ch. XVI., &c. A controversy arose in the sixteenth century on the necessity of good works to salvation. Melancthon was accustomed to admit this necessity. The more rigid Lutherans considered his views on the subject a departure from those of their master. Major, in 1562, defended Melancthon's opinion against Nicholas Amador, who maintained that good works are pernicious to salvation. Major made a partial retraction, and in 1577 the controversy was terminated by the Formula of Concord. [FORMULA, s., ¶ (2).]

Work is the general term, as including that which calls for the exertion of our strength: labour differs from it in the degree of exertion required, it is hard work; toil expresses a still higher degree of painful exertion; drudgery implies a mean and degrading work, and is the lot of those lowest in society. Work is more or less voluntary, but a task is work imposed by others.

work-bag, s. A small bag used by ladies in which to keep their needlework, &c.; a reticule.

work-box, s. A box used to keep small pieces of needlework, and fitted with a tray to contain needles, cotton, &c.

work-ful, a. [Eng. work, and -full.] Full of work or designed for work.

"Von saw nothing in Coketown, but what was severely workful."--Dickens: Hard Times, ch. v.

work-house, worke-house, s. [Eng. work and house.]

1. A house for work; a manufactory, a factory.

"Those employed in every different branch of the work can often be collected into the same workhouse, and placed at once under the view of the spectator."--Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. I, ch. I.

2. A house in which paupers are lodged, and those of them who are able-bodied are compelled to work. Workhouses were originally erected in the reign of Charles II., in order to compel rogues and vagabonds to work for a living. They have since then become one of the essentials of the organization of nations, and have extended, in one form or other, throughout Europe, every nation of which is confronted with the problem of the incapable poor. In the United States, as in Scotland, they are usually designated poorhouses, not workhouses, as in England. Each state has its own poor laws, and each is expected to care for its own poor, a poor-tax being laid for their support. Any American who becomes a pauper loses the rights of citizenship. The Massachusetts law, which generally represents the character of the poor-law throughout the Union, provides for the erection of township poorhouses for the support and employment of all indigent persons who are a charge upon the town; of all able-bodied indigent persons who refuse to work; of all who lead a dissolute vagrant life, with no regular business; and others of the idle and vagrant class. Those able to work may be required to do so, as in a house of correction. The American system is marked by definite classification, variety of work, and liberal diet. Under English law every work-house has to keep a register of religious creeds. The inmates of workhouses are not allowed to go out and in at pleasure, and the able-bodied are compelled to work when required. Married persons are separated, unless both are over sixty years of age. Religious and secular instruction is supplied, and wholesome food and sufficient clothing provided. The maintenance, control, and sanitary appliances of workhouses are under the control of the Poor-law Board.

3. A gaol, a house of correction.

"Where am I? where's my lord? what world is this?"
Shakesp.: Pericles, iii. 2.

6. The earth considered as the scene of man's present existence, or the sphere of human action; the present state of existence.

"That was the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world."
John i. 9.

7. Any state or sphere of existence; any wide scene of life or action; as, a future world, the world to come.

8. The inhabitants of this world in general; humanity, mankind; the human race.

"One touch of nature makes the whole world kin."
Shakesp.: Troilus & Cressida, iii. 3.

9. People generally; the public; society; the people amongst whom we live.

"The world will hold thee to disdain."
Shakesp.: Venus & Adonis, 761.

10. A certain class, action, or portion of mankind considered as a separate or independent whole; a number or body of people united in a common faith, aim, interest, pursuit, or the like; as, the religious world, the heathen world, the literary world.

11. Public or social life; intercourse with one's fellow-men; society.

"Hence banished, is banished from the world."
Shakesp.: Romeo & Juliet, iii. 2.

12. That which pertains to the earth or to the present state of existence only; secular affairs; a secular life; the concerns of this life, as distinguished from those of the life to come; worldly pursuits or interests.

"Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world."
John ii. 15.

13. That portion of mankind which is devoted to worldly or secular affairs; those who are exclusively interested in the affairs of this life; people who are concerned merely for the interests and pleasures of this life; the ungodly or unregenerate portion of mankind.

"I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me."
John xvii. 9.

14. The ways and manners of mankind; the habits, customs, and usages of society; social life in its various aspects.

"To know the world, 'a modern phrase
For visits, ombre, balls, and plays."
Swift: (Todd).

15. A course of life; a career.

"Persons of conscience will be afraid to begin the world unjustly."
Richardson: Clarissa.

16. The current of events, especially as affecting an individual; circumstances, affairs, particularly those closely relating to one's self. (Colloq.)

"How goes the world with thee?"
Shakesp.: Richard III., iii. 2.

17. Any sphere of more or less complexity or development, characterized by harmony, order, or completeness; anything forming an organic whole; a microcosm.

"He was, for all the world, exactly like a forked radish."
Shakesp.: 2 Henry IV., iii. 2.

4. It is a world to see: It is a treat to see.

"'Tis a world to see . . . how tame a meacock wretch can make the curtest shrew."
Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, ii.

5. Rose of the World:

Bot.: Camellia japonica. [CAMELLIA.]

6. The world's end: The most remote or distant part of the earth.

"To go to the world: To get married."
"Thou goes every one to the world, but I may sit in a corner, and cry, heigh-ho for a husband."
Shakesp.: Much Ado About Nothing, ii. 1.

¶ Hence the phrase a woman of the world = a married woman. (Shakesp.: As You Like It, v. 3.)

8. World without end: To all eternity; eternally, everlastingly.

¶ Used adjectively by Shakespeare = infinite, endless.

"Nor dare I hide the world-without-end hour."
Bonnet 57.

World-English. s. The name given by Mr. Melville Bell to a new phonetic system of spelling the English language, so as to render its acquisition by foreigners more easy, and to make it available for international use.

"The author has, therefore, endeavored to make his 'World-English' as little unlike 'literary English' as possible (even making considerable sacrifices of phonetic precision for this purpose), so that the transition from the one to the other may be rendered easier."
Athenaeum, Sept. 1, 1888, p. 287.

* world-hardened, a. Hardened in heart by the love of worldly things.

* world-sharer, s. One of a company of persons who have divided the sovereignty of the world between them. (Special coinage.) Applied to the triumvirs Antony, Cæsar, and Lepidus.

"These three world-sharers, these competitors."
Shakesp.: Antony & Cleopatra, ii. 7.

world-snake, s.

Anthrop.: The Mithgarðs-ormr, an enormous serpent which, according to the Edda, lies in the deep sea, biting its own tail, and encircling the earth.

world-tree, s.

Anthrop.: A mythical ash (askr Yggdrasile), which in Scandinavian mythology is supposed to link hell, earth, and heaven together. Some writers see in this myth a distortion of the Story of the Cross, but the translator of Grimm (Deut. Myth. ii. 798) says "it were a far likelier theory, that floating heathen traditions of the world-tree, soon after the conversion in Germany, France, or England, attached themselves to an object of Christian faith just as heathen temples and holy places were converted into Christian ones."

* world-weared, a. Worn or tired of this world.

"And shake the yoke of inauspicious stars
From this world-wearied flesh."
Shakesp.: Romeo & Juliet, v. 3.

world-wide, a. Extending over or pervading all the world; widely spread; as, world-wide fame.

* wōrld, v. t. [WORLD, &.] To introduce into the world.

Shakesp.: Titus Andronicus, i. 2.

2. Devoted to, interested in, or connected with the present world, its affairs, interests, cares, or enjoyments, to the exclusion of those of the world to come; desirous of temporal advantages, gain, or enjoyments only; earthly, as opposed to heavenly or spiritual; carnal; sordid. (Said of persons and things.)

"The manifest, indecent and intolerant as was it done, was, in the view of these fanatics, a cowardly and worldly performance."
Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

B. As adv. In a worldly manner; with relation to this life.

worldly-minded, a. Devoted to the acquisition of worldly or temporal possessions, gain, or pleasures; carnal-minded.

worldly-mindedness, s. The quality or state of being worldly-minded; an unduly strong passion or craving for the good things of this life to the exclusion of piety and attention to spiritual concerns.

"We are full of worldly-mindedness."
Sp. Sermons, p. 148.

worldly-wise, a. Wise with regard to matters of the world. (Usually in a depreciatory sense.)

"The inexperienced bride is taught by her worldly-wise instructress how to get her way."
St. James's Gazette, Jan. 24, 1888.

wōrm, * worme, s. & a. [A.S. wyrm = a worm, a snake, a dragon; cogn. with Dut. worm; leel. ormr; Dan. & Sw. orm (for worm); Ger. wurm; Goth. wurms; Lat. vermis; Lith. kirmis = a worm; O. Ir. crium = a worm; Ir. crium = a maggot; Sansc. krimi = a worm (whence crimson and carmine). An initial guttural has been lost.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

* (1) Applied to creeping things of all sorts; a reptile, a serpent, a snake.

"There came a viper out of the heat and leapt on his hand. When the men of the country saw the worm hang on his hand they said, This man must needs be a murderer."
Tyndale: Acts xviii. 3, 4.

(2) In the same sense as II. I.

(3) Applied loosely to any small creeping animal, entirely wanting feet, or having very short ones, including the larvae or grubs of certain insects, as caterpillars, maggots, &c.; intestinal parasites, as the tapeworm, thread-worm, &c.; certain lacertilians, as the blind-worm, &c.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Used as an epithet of scorn, disgust, or contempt, sometimes of contemptuous pity; a poor, grovelling, debased, despised creature.

"Poor worm, thou art infected."
Shakesp.: Tempest, iii. 1.

(2) Applied to one who silently, slowly, and persistently works or studies; as, a bookworm.

(3) Applied to something that slowly and silently eats or works its way internally to the destruction or pain of the object affected: as—

(a) The emblem of corruption, decay, or death.

"Thus chides the Death,
Grim-grinning ghost, earth's worm, what dost thou mean?"
Shakesp.: Venus & Adonis, 308.

(b) An emblem of the gnawing torments of conscience; remorse.

"The worm of conscience still begins thy soul."
Shakesp.: Richard III., i. 3.

(4) Anything resembling a worm in appearance, especially when in motion; anything vermicular or spiral: as—

(a) The spiral of a corkscrew,

(b) The thread on the shaft or core of a screw.

(c) A sharp-pointed spiral tool, used for boring soft rock; that which is too hard to be pierced by the auger, but not hard enough to require the jumper.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, what, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, oūb, oūre, unīte, oūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

(d) A spiral wire on the end of the ramrod or rammer, for withdrawing a charge; a wad-hook.

(e) A spiral pipe in a condenser; a continuation of the neck or beak.

(f) A small vermicular ligament under the tongue of a dog. This ligament is frequently cut out when the animal is young, for the purpose of checking a disposition to gnaw at everything. The operation was formerly supposed to check rabies or madness.

"In dogs . . . the worm may help by its elasticity, and that of its sheath, in the act of lapping."—Owen: Anatomy of Vertebrates, III. 127.

II. Technically:

1. Zool.: Any individual of the phylum Vermes (q.v.). They differ greatly in outward appearance, and in habits, and very many are parasitic in other animals. They do not move by means of articulated limbs, nor is the body jointed like that of a crustacean or an insect. But whatever shape the body may assume, it is composed of incomplete segments, the majority of which are similar, and is more or less ringed externally. The segments are provided with offensive and locomotive organs on both sides, and usually with a special excretory organ opening from within. There is a water-system communicating with the perivisceral cavity and with the outside. The digestive system is often fairly developed, but in some parasites it is wanting, and these are nourished by absorption through the body walls. A kind of circulatory system is sometimes present, as are special organs of respiration, such as the branchial filaments of the Terebellidae; but both are also often absent. The nervous system may consist of a cord round the oesophagus, with ganglia above and below, and a ganglionic cord along the ventral surface within; or there may be but faint traces of the system. Sense-organs may exist in a rudimentary condition. The organs and structures of the body are, to a great extent, the same on both sides, and hence there is bilateral symmetry.

2. Pathol.: Many species of intestinal worms infest the human frame. The chief are Trichocephalus dispar, the Long Thread-worm [TRICHOCEPHALUS]; Ascaris lumbricoides, the Large Round Worm [ASCARIS]; Oxyuris vermicularis (OXYURIS), the Small Threadworm, Sclerostoma, or Anchylostoma duodenale [SCLEROSTOMA]; Tenia solium, T. mediocanellata, and Bothriocephalus latus [TAPEWORM].

B. As adj.: Pertaining or relating to worms; produced by worms: as, worm fever.

worm-bark, s. [SURINAM-BARK.]

worm-burrow, s.

Geol.: [SCOLITE.]

worm-cast, s. A small intestine-shaped mass of earth voided, often on the surface of the ground, by the earthworm after all the digestible matter has been extracted from it.

worm-eat, v.t. To gnaw or perforate, as worms do; hence, to impair by a slow, insidious process.

"Leave off these vanities which worm-eat your brain."—Jarris: Don Quixote, pt. II, bk. IV, ch. 2.

worm-eat, a. Worm-eaten, old, worthless.

*1. To pay honour to; to honour. (See extract under A. 2.)

2. To treat or regard with reverence, respect, or admiration.

"A phrase in one of our occasional Services, 'with my body I thee worship,' has perplexed and sometimes offended those who were unacquainted with the early use of the word, and thus with the intention of the actual framers of that Service. Clearly in our modern sense of 'worship,' this language would be inadmissible. But 'worship' or 'worshipful' meant 'honour' in our early English, and 'to worship' to honour, this meaning of 'worship' still very harmoniously surviving in 'worshipful,' and in the title of 'your worship' addressed to the magistrate on the bench. So little was it restrained of old to the intention of the man is bound to pay to God, that it is employed by Wycliffe to express the honour which God will render to his faithful servants and friends. Thus our Lord's declaration, 'If any man serve Me, him will my Father honour,' in Wycliffe's translation reads thus, 'If any man serve Me, my Father shall worship him.' —Trench: English Past & Present, lect. viii.

wound, * wounde, s. [A.S. wund, cogn. with Dut. wound, wonde; Icel. und (for vund); Dan. vunde; O. H. Ger. wunta; Ger. wunde = a wound, wund = wounded; Goth. wunds = wounded. Formed from the pa. par. of the strong verb signifying "to fight," or "suffer," represented in A.S. by winnan = to strive, to fight, to suffer; pa. par. wunnen. (Skeat.)]

1. A breach or rupture of the skin and flesh of an animal caused by violence, or, in surgical phrase, a solution of continuity in any of the soft parts of the body occasioned by external violence, and attended with a greater or less amount of bleeding. Wounds are classified as follows:

(1) Cuts, incisions, or incised wounds, produced by sharp-edged instruments.

(2) Stabs or punctured wounds, made by the thrusts of pointed weapons.

(3) Contused wounds, produced by the violent application of hard, blunt, obtuse bodies to the soft parts.

(4) Lacerated wounds, in which there is tearing or laceration, as by some rough instrument.

(5) Gunshot wounds.

(6) Poisoned wounds, wounds complicated with the introduction of some poison or venom into the part.

"Where sharp the pang, and mortal is the wound."
Pope : Homer ; Iliad XIII. 719.

¶ Wounds which have severed only muscles and the blood-vessels and nerves connected with them heal more easily than those which affect the tendons. As a rule wounds made by a sharp weapon or instrument heal more quickly than bruises produced by the blow of a weapon which is blunt; as, for instance, a club. When an artery is severed, bright red blood is ejected by spurts; when a vein is cut, dark blood comes forth more slowly. In either case nature makes immediate efforts to repair the injury. Even in the case of an artery, the blood after a time tends to flow less freely, and an external coagulum to be formed which ultimately stops its effusion. The object of the surgeon is to stop the flow of blood, to bring together the severed portions of a vessel and keep them together till nature re-unites them, using appliances to prevent the access of the atmospheric air with its myriads of germs. In unfavourable cases tetanus results, or pyæmia, or both.

2. Any injury to the bark and wood of a tree, or of the bark and substance of other plants.

3. Any hurt, pain, or injury; as, a wound to credit or reputation. Especially applied to the pangs of love.

Ornithology:

1. The popular name for any of the Troglodytidae (q.v.), especially Troglodytes parvulus, the Common Wren, widely dispersed over Great Britain and Ireland, ranging through Europe to the North of Africa and Asia. There are numerous species of wren in the state, fát, fáro, amidst, whát, fáil, father; wé, wét, hère, camél, hór, thère; pine, pít, síre, sír, marine; gó, pót, or, wóre, wólf, wórk, whó, són; múte, cúb. cúre, únite, óur, rúle, fúll; trý, Sýrian. se, ce = é; ey = á; qu = kw.

United States, mostly belonging to different genera. The House Wren (T. domesticus) is larger than the European Wren, being about five inches long, and is less shy, building near houses and in boxes prepared for it. It is abundant in the eastern part of the country. The male is pugnacious, attacking birds much larger than itself. The Winter Wren (T. hyemalis) is closely similar to the European Wren. It is common from Labrador to Louisiana. Several other American species closely agree in habits with the Common Wren. The nest of the latter bird is large, generally oval, and dome-shaped at top, with a small hole at one end or in the side. The eggs are usually from six to eight in number.

2. The name is also applied to several of the Sylviidae, with which the Common Wren was formerly classed. Repulus cristatus is the Golden-crested, and R. ignicapillus the Fire-crested Wren, &c.

writ-ing, *wryt-ing, *wryt-yng, pr. par., a., & s. [WRITE, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb).

B. As adj.: Pertaining to the art or act of writing; used for writing.

C. As substantive:

1. The act or art of forming letters and characters on paper, parchment, wood, stone, or other material, for the purpose of recording ideas or of communicating them to others by visible signs.

¶ Writing may be divided into ideographic and phonographic, i.e., into signs representing the things symbolized by words, and signs representing sounds—that is, words themselves. In Egyptian hieroglyphs we have ideographs and phonographs mixed together; and the same thing occurs in the Mexican picture-writing. It is generally agreed that the art of writing was introduced to the western nations by the Phœnicians about 1500 B.C. Their system was probably based on the Egyptian. The Egyptians had three distinct kinds of writing—the hieroglyphic, the hieratic, and the enchorial or demotic. (See these words.) The Greeks at first wrote from right to left; next they adopted a method called boustrophedon, from the motion of the ox in ploughing—that is, alternately from right to left, and from left to right. Writing from left to right is said to have been introduced in the time of Homer by Pronapides of Athens. In ancient Greek and Roman writing the words were not separated by spaces, and no punctuation marks were used. In mediæval MSS, a variety of styles were used in different epochs and countries, and for different uses. [MAJUSCULE, MINUSCULE.] Uncial letters prevailed from the seventh to the tenth centuries. [UNCIAL.] The Gothic cursive was introduced about the middle of the thirteenth century. The Modern German alphabet was also introduced about the same time. The Norman style came in with the Conqueror. The English court hand, an adaptation of Saxon, prevailed from the sixteenth century to the reign of George II., when its use was legally abolished. There are no traces of writing in Britain previous to the Roman period. The Runic alphabet, used for many centuries in Denmark, Norway, and Iceland, was based on the Roman. Chinese characters are syllabic, and as Chinese words are monosyllables, they are strictly ideographic. Their system is said to contain 40,000 characters. Sanscrit possesses the most perfect known alphabet: its consonants number thirty-three and its vowel signs fourteen. It is written from left to right. [CUNEIFORM, OGHAM, PHONETIC, RUNIC, SHORTEHAND.]

2. That which is written; anything written or expressed in letters: as

(1) An inscription.

"And Pilate wrote a title, and put it on the cross. And the writing was, Jesus of Nazareth the King of the Jews."—John, xix. 19.

wry-néck, s. [See def.]

Ornith.: Any bird of the genus Icthyophaga (q.v.); specif. Icthyophaga torquilla, the Common Wryneck, a summer visitant to the north of Europe and Britain. Length about seven inches; general colour of upper parts, including the tail, grayish-white, mottled all over with brownish-gray, and obscurely barred and streaked with dark brown wings, brown barred with dull chestnut on the outer webs of the feathers; under parts buff, each feather with a narrow dark-brown spot near the tip. Little or no variation in the female. It feeds on caterpillars and other insects, and is often seen near ant-hills in search of the cocoons, popularly known as "ant's eggs." The construction of the protrusible tongue resembles that of the woodpecker, and the organ is furnished with glands secreting a glutinous mucus which causes the prey to adhere to its horny tip. The Wryneck rarely makes a nest, or at best but a very poor one, usually depositing its eggs in some hole in a tree. The name Wryneck is derived from the bird's habit of writhing its head and neck in various directions with a serpentine motion. It has a number of other popular names [Cuckoo's MATR, TURKEY-BIRD], and is probably the Hobby-bird of Browne (Birds of Norfolk). His description, "marvellously subject to the vertigo," refers, in Seeborn's opinion, to the wryneck's habit of feigning death when taken; while Wilkin thinks it is founded on the "singular motion of its head and neck." The actual habitat of the bird is Central Europe and Asia.

"That curious bird the wryneck, so dear to the classical scholar from its associations with witchcraft in Theocritus and Virgil, is the first to arrive; and certainly the weird manner in which its head seems to turn every way, as if on a pivot, while mouse-like it crawls up and round an old well, goes far to account for its reputation as an uncanny bird."—St. James's Gazette, March 9, 1887.

wry-néss, wry-nesse, s. [Eng. wry, a.; -ness.]

1. Lit.: The quality or state of being wry or distorted; crookedness.

Min.: A dimorphous form of blende (q.v.). Crystallization, hexagonal, being isomorphous with greenockite. Hardness, 3.5 to 4; sp. gr., 3.98; lustre, vitreous; colour and streak, brownish to brownish-black. Found crystallized near Oruro, Bolivia. Breithaupt states that the radiated (cadmiferous) blende of Przibram, Bohemia, is hexagonal in crystallization; his Spiauterite (q.v.).

wūr-zel, s. [Ger. wurzel = root.] [MANOULD-WURZEL.]

wusse, adv. [A variant of -wie in ywis (q.v.).] Certainly.

"I hope you will not a-hawking now, will you? No, wusse, but I'll practise against next year, uncle."
Ben Jonson.

wūth-ēr, v.t. [From the sound.] To rustle, as the wind amongst trees; to make a sudden roar. (Prov.)

"Wuthering Heights is the name of Mr. Heathcliff's dwelling, wuthering being a significant provincial adjective descriptive of the atmospheric tumult to which its station is exposed in stormy weather."—C. Brontë: Wuthering Heights, ch. I.

wūth-ēr, s. [WUTHER, v.] The sound made by the rustling of the wind amongst the branches of trees. (Prov.)

"Sure by the smither of wind amongst trees, denoting a garden outside."—Miss Brontë: Vilette, ch. xvi.

wūz-zent, a. [WIZZENED.] Dried, withered. (Scotch.)

"Wadna I set my ten talents in your wizzent face for that very word?"—Scott: Heart of Midlothian, ch. xviii.

wých (1), s. [WITCH (2).]

wyoch-elm, s. [WITCH-ELM.]

wych-hazel, s. [WITCH-HAZEL.]

wých (2), s. [WICK (1), s.] (See extract.)

"The principal occupation is the manufacture of the salt obtained from the brine springs, or wýches, to which the town probably owes both its name and its origin."—Encyc. Brit. [ed. 8th], vii, 471.

wyoch-house, s. (See extract.)

"The houses in which salt is manufactured are called wyoch-houses."—Woodward: Geol. of Eng. & Wales, p. 132.

wyoch-waller, s. A salt-boiler at a wých. (Cheshire.)

Wýc-liff-ite, s. & a. [See def.]

A. As substantive.

Eccles. & Church Hist.: The followers of John Wycliffe, Wiclif, or de Wiclif, &c. (there are about twenty ways of spelling the name). He was born at Hipswell, near Richmond, about A.D. 1324, and was educated at Oxford University. He is believed to have been in conflict with the Mendicant Orders about 1360, but none of his extant writings on the subject seem to have been penned at so early a date. In or about that year he obtained the wardenship of Balliol Hall, exchanged about 1365 for that of Canterbury Hall, which he soon lost, on account of alleged mental incapacity in the archbishop from whom he received the appointment. This deprivation was confirmed on appeal both by the Pope and the king. In July, 1374, he was nominated member of a legation to Pope Gregory XI. about Papal provisions, or reservation of churches. On February 8, 1377, he was summoned to appear before a Convocation of the Clergy on a charge of heresy, which ended abortively. On May 22, 1377, five Papal bulls were issued against him, and next year a second ecclesiastical trial took place, the Londoners, who are said to have been opposed to him on the former occasion, taking his part on this. In May, 1382, a synod of divines condemned his opinions, which led to his being prevented from any longer teaching in the University. In 1381 he issued sixteen theses against transubstantiation. Apparently about 1380 or 1381 he published the translation into English of the Bible and Apocrypha from the Latin Vulgate; a second edition or retranslation, less literal but smoother in style, was issued by John Purvey about A.D. 1388. This was after the death of Wycliffe, which took place in the parish of Lutterworth, in Leicestershire, of which he was rector, on December 31, 1384. On May 2, 1415, the Council of Constance condemned Wycliffe's tenets, and ordered that his books should be destroyed and his body dug up and burnt. (For his tenets see LOLLARDISM, for his followers LOLLARDS. See also HUSSITES.)

B. As adj.: Of or belonging to Wycliffe, his tenets or followers. [A.]

wýe, s. [See def.] A Y or crotch. Used in many ways as a temporary shore or brace. Also a name applied to a stem or pipe with branches, as a stand-pipe or delivery-pipe with two issues from its summit. One of the supports of a telescope, theodolite, or leveling instrument. Written also Y.

Wýke-ham-ist, s. [See def.] A name applied to the boya st Winchester College, founded by William of Wykeham (1324-1404), Bishop of Winchester. Used also adjectively.

"From 700 to 800 Wýkehamists assembled on Saturday to take part in the five hundredth anniversary of the laying of the foundation-stone of the Winchester College."—St. James's Gazette, March 28, 1887.

wýl-ie, a. [Etym. doubtful.] (See compound.)

wylie-coat, s. A boy's flannel underdress next the shirt; a flannel-petticoat (Scotch.)

"Or althins some hit doddie boy, On's wylie-coat."
Burns: To a Loun

wý-mot, wý-mole, wýs-mal-va, s. [WIMOT.]

wynd (y as ä), s. [WIND, v.] An alley, a lane. (Scotch.)

"Among the closes and wynds."—Scott: Redgauntlet, ch. xxi.

wýnn, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A kind of timber-truck or carriage. (Simmonds.) wyte, v.t. [WITE, v.]

wyte, s. [WITE.]

wýth, s. [WITHE.]

Bot.: Tournefortia bicolor. [WHITE-ROOF.]

fäte, fät, färe, amidst, wähät, fäll, fäther; wë, wët, hëre, camël, hër, thëre; pïne, pît, sire, sir, marine; gö, pöt, or, wöre, wölf, wörk, whò, sön; müte, cüb, cüre, quite, cür, rüle, rüll; trý, Sýrian. a, æ = ö; ey = ä; qu = kw.

wy-vörn, wí-vörn, s. [Mid. Eng. where = a serpent (Chaucer: Troilus & Criseida, iii. 1,012), with excrement n, as in bittern, from O. Fr. where = a serpent, viper; Fr. givre = a viper, from Lat. viperā. Wyvern and viper are doublets.] [QUAVIVER, VIPER.]

WYVERN.

Her.: An imaginary animal; a kind of dragon with wings, but having only two legs, the termination of its body being somewhat serpentine in form.

X.

X, the twenty-fourth letter of the English alphabet, is a superfluous letter, as it represents no sound which cannot be expressed by other letters. Thus, when used at the beginning of a word it has precisely the sound of x; when occurring in the middle of a word it usually has the sound of ks, as in axis, taxes, foxes, &c.; it also has the same sound in some cases when terminating a word, as tax, war, &c.; when it terminates a syllable, and more especially an initial syllable, if the syllable following it is open or accented, it frequently has the sound of gz, as in luxury, exhaust, exalt, epic, &c. As an initial it occurs only in words of Greek origin, or formed from Greek words, most of these formations being of a scientific or technical nature.

X as a symbol is used:

(1) In numer.: For ten, in this case being composed of two Vs (= 5) placed one above the other, the lower one being inverted. When placed horizontally (X) it stands for a thousand, and with a dash over it (X̄) it represents ten thousand.

(2) In ordinary writing X is frequently used as an abbreviation for Christ. In this case the symbol is not the same letter as the English X, but represents the Greek X (= Ch), as in Xⁿ = Christian, Xmas = Christmas.

2. X as used on beer-casks is said to have originally been employed to indicate beer which had paid ten shillings duty.

xanth-, pref. [XANTHO-]

xán-thá-míde, s. [Pref. xanth-, and Eng. amide.]

Chem.: C₃H₇ONS = COS(C₂H₅)₂NH₂. A crystalline substance produced by passing ammoniacal gas into an alcoholic solution of xanthic ether. Insoluble in water, but soluble in alcohol and ether.

xán-thán, s. [Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow; Eng. auff. -an.]

Chem.: Berzelius's name for the group Cy₂S₂, regarded as the radicle of perulpho-cyanic acid.

xán-tha-rín, s. [Formed from Eng. xanthate (q.v.).]

Chem.: Xanthil. An oily, fetid compound, supposed by Couerbe to be produced by the dry distillation of xanthic ether. (Watts.)

xánth-ar-pý-x-s, s. [Pref. xanth-, and Lat. harpysia.] [HARPYA.]

Zool.: A genus of Pteropodidae, closely allied to Pteropus, with a single species, Xantharpyia amblycaudata, from the Austro-Malayan sub-region.

xán-thate, s. [Eng. xanthic; -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of xanthic acid.

xanthate of potassium, s.

Chem.: C₃H₇O₂KS₂ = C^S_{SK} O₂C₂H₅. Obtained

by adding carbonic disulphide to a saturated alcoholic solution of potassium hydrate. It separates in slender, colourless prisms, soluble in water and alcohol, insoluble in ether. Gradually destroyed by exposure to the air.

xán-tház-a-rín, s. [Pref. xanth-, and Eng. alizarin.]

Chem.: A yellow colouring matter, prepared by the action of nitric acid on the black residue obtained in preparing pure alizarin.

It is slightly soluble in water, soluble in alcohol, ether, and in caustic alkalis.

xán-thé-in, s. [Formed from Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow.]

Chem.: Frémy's name for that portion of the yellow colouring matter of flowers which is soluble in water.

xánth-é-lás-ma, s. [Pref. xanth-, and Gr. λάσμα (lasma) = a metal plate.]

Pathol.: The name given by Dr. Erasmus Wilson to a cutaneous disease, consisting of isolated or confluent tubercles varying from the size of a pin's head to that of a pea. Its most frequent seat is around the eyelids.

xán-thé-léne, s. [Pref. xanth-; Eng. elthy, and suff. -lene.]

Chem.: Zeise's name for an oil produced by precipitating potassium ethylsulpho-carbonate with a cupric salt.

xán-thí-a, s. [Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow.]

Entom.: A genus of Orthosidæ, with wings forming a very inclined roof. The caterpillar feeds on the buds or the catkins of trees. Six species are British. The type is Xanthia ceraga, the Sallow-moth (q.v.).

xán-thí-an, a. [See def.] Or of belonging to Xanthus, an ancient town in Asia Minor.

xanthian-marbles, s. pl.

Classic Antiq.: A large collection of marbles of various ages (from B.C. 546 onwards) discovered by Mr. (afterwards Sir) Charles Fellows near Xanthus, in 1838. They were brought to England in 1842 and 1843, and placed in the British Museum.

xán-thío, a. [Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow, and Eng. auff. -ic.]

Chem.: Derived from or contained in xanthio-ether, and of a yellow colour.

xanthio-acid, s.

Chem.: C₃H₆OS₂ = C^S_{SH} O₂H₅. A colourless oily liquid, prepared by decomposing xanthate of potassium with dilute sulphuric or hydrochloric acid. It is heavier than water, has a powerful and peculiar odour, and decomposes at 24° into alcohol and carbonic disulphide. Its salts are yellow.

xanthio-ether, s.

Chem.: (C₂H₅)₂.COS₂ = C^S_{C₂H₅} O₂H₅. Ethylic disulpho-carbonate. A pale yellowish oil, obtained by the action of ethyl chloride on xanthate of potassium. It is insoluble in water, soluble in all proportions in alcohol and ether, and boils at 210°.

xanthio-oxide, s. [XANTHINE.]

xanthio-series, s. pl. [CVANIC-SERIES.]

xán-thíd'-i-úm, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow.]

Palæobot.: A pseudo-genus of Confervæeæ, now believed to be sporangia of Desmidiaceæ. Microscopic spherical bodies with radiating spines. Fourteen species from the Upper Cretaceous rocks. (Etheridge.)

xán-thíl, s. [Formed from Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow.] [XANTHARIN.]

xán-thín, s. [Or. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow; Eng. auff. -in.]

Chem.: A name applied to various substances. From Frémy and Cloez to that portion of the yellow colouring matter of flowers insoluble in water. By Schunck to a yellow colouring matter obtained from madder; and by Couerbe to a gaseous product obtained by the decomposition of xanthates.

xán-thíne, s. [Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow; Eng. suff. -ine.]

Chem.: C₅H₄N₄O₂. Xanthic oxide. An organic base, first discovered and described by Dr. Marceet, as a constituent of a rare form of urinary calculi, but afterwards found among the products of the decomposition of guanine. It is prepared by adding potassium nitrite to a solution of guanine in hot concentrated nitric acid, precipitating with water, filtering, dissolving residue in boiling ammonia, treating with a solution of ferrous sulphate as long as black ferrous-ferrie-oxide separates, filtering and evaporating the filtrate to dryness. It is a white amorphous powder, difficultly soluble in water, soluble in alkalis and in concentrated acids, and distinguished by the deep yellow colour produced when its solution in nitric acid is evaporated to dryness.

xán-thí-níne, s. [Eng. xanthin; -ine.]

Chem.: C₄H₂N₃O₂. A yellow powder, prepared by heating ammonium thiocyanate to 200°. It is slightly soluble in boiling water, the solution having a light blue fluorescence, but dissolves readily in nitric and hydrochloric acids.

xánth-in-ó-car-pín, s. [Pref. xanth-, and Eng. inocarpin.]

Chem.: A yellow colouring matter extracted from the juice which exudes from incisions made in the bark of Inocarpus edulis.

xán-thí-ó-píte, s. [Formed from ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow.]

Min.: A name given by Adam to an amorphous nickel ore analysed by Bergemann. Hardness, 4.0; sp. gr., 4.982; colour, sulphur-yellow. Compos.: arsenic acid, 50.5; nickel, 49.5 = 100, whence the formula 3NiOAsO₃. Found at Johanngeorgenstadt, Saxony.

xán-thít-áne, s. [Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow; -it connect., and suff. -ane (Min.).]

Min.: A pulverulent mineral found associated with zircon (q.v.) at Green River, Henderson Co., North Carolina, U.S.A. Hardness, 3.5; sp. gr., 2.7 to 3.0. Analysis showed it to consist of titanate acid, with traces of zirconia, and 12.5 per cent. of water. Probably a result of the decomposition of Spheue (q.v.).

xán-thíte, s. [Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A yellowish-brown variety of Idocrase (q.v.), containing 2.50 per cent. of protoxide of manganese. Found near Amity, Orange County, New York, U.S.A.

xán-thí-úm, s. [Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow. So named because an infusion of species of the genus was used by the Greeks to dye their hair.]

Bot.: Burweed; a genus of Senecionideæ, sub-tribe Ambrosiæe. Monœcious Composites; the barren flowers having an involucre of few scales, with many capitate flowers on a common receptacle, the fertile ones with a single, prickly, two-beaked involucre enclosing the flowers, and with apertures for the protrusion of the two stigmas, fruit included in the enlarged and hardened involucre. Xanthium strumarium and X. spinosum are casuals in Britain; the former is a weed common in waste places, on river banks, and near villages in India, and is troublesome to cultivators. It is said to yield an oil, used in medicine and as an illuminant. The whole plant is considered to be diaphoretic and sedative. It is administered in decoction in malarious fever. The root is a bitter tonic, useful in cancer and in strumous diseases. The leaves are poisonous to cattle.

xán-thó-, pref. [Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow.] Yellow, the meaning amplified by the succeeding element or elements of a word.

xán-thó, s. [Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow.]

Zool.: A genus of Canceride, with many species, widely distributed. Carapace very wide, not particularly convex; front generally advanced, lamellar, divided by a narrow fissure into two lobes, with their borders notched in the middle; anterior feet generally unequal in the male; abdomen with seven segments in the female, and, as a rule, five in the male.

xán-thó-bé-tíc, a. [Pref. xantho-; Mod. Lat. beta = beet-root, and Eng. suff. -ic.] Derived from or contained in beet, and having a yellow colour.

xanthobetic-acid, s.

Chem.: An acid extracted from the root of Beta vulgaris by cold alcohol. It is a reddish-yellow mass, very hygroscopic, has a sour taste, is soluble in water and alcohol, slightly soluble in ether.

xán-thó-car-póus, a. [Pref. xantho-; Gr. καρπός (karpós) = fruit, and Eng. auff. -ous.] Bot.: Having yellow fruit.

ból, bóy; pout, jówl; cat, cell, chorn, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = é
-cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = hcl del.

xân-thô-chrô-î, s. pl. [Gr. ξανθοχρῶος (xanthochroos) = with yellow skin; pref. xân-thô, and Gr. χρῶος (chros) = the skin.]

Anthrop.: Fair Whites. The name applied by Huxley to a population, in early times extending from Western and Central Asia into Eastern and Central Europe, and distinguished by yellow or red hair, blue eyes, and fair complexion. The farthestmost limit of the Xanthochroi northward is Iceland and the British Isles; south-westward they are traceable at intervals through the Berber country, and end in the Canary Islands.

"To avoid the endless confusion produced by our present half-physical, half-philological classification, I shall use a new name, Xanthochroi, indicating that they are 'yellow haired, and 'pale' in complexion." -Huxley: Critiques, p. 112.

xân-thô-chrô-ic, a. [Mod. Lat. xanthochroi (q.v.); Eng. suff. -ic.] Having a fair skin; of or belonging to the Xanthochroi (q.v.).

"If any one should think it to assume that in the year 100 a.c. there was one continuous Xanthochroic population from the Rhine to the Yucsel, and from the Ural mountains to the Hindoo Koosh, I know not that any evidence exists by which that position could be upset while the existing state of things is either in its favour than otherwise." -Huxley: Critiques, p. 110.

xân-thô-chý-mûs, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Gr. χυμός (chumos) = juice, liquid. So named from the yellow juice exuding from their trunks.]

Bot.: A genus of Garcinieæ (q.v.). Trees with thick, opposite leaves; five sepals; five petals; five bundles of stamens, alternating with five large glands; a five-celled ovary; a fruit with five or fewer cells. Known species three, from tropical Asia. Xanthochymus pictorius (= Garcinia Xanthochymus) occurs in the mountains of Southern India. It has a bright yellow, pleasant-tasted fruit of about the size of an apricot. The juice of the tree furnishes an inferior kind of gamboge.

xân-thô-cône, xân-thôc-ô-nite, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Gr. κόνη (konis) = powder; Ger. xanthokon.]

Min.: A very rare mineral occurring only in small crystals and reniform groups associated with stephanite, proustite, &c. Crystallization, rhombohedral. Hardness, 2.0; sp. gr., 5.0 to 5.2; colour, dull red, clove-brown, orange-yellow; brittle. Compos.: sulphur, 21.1; arsenic, 14.9; silver, 64.0 = 100, whence the formula (3AgS + As₂S₃) + 2(3AgS + As₂S₃).

xân-thô-gên, xân-thô-gênê, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Gr. γεννάω (gennaô) = to engender, to produce.]

Chem.: Hope's name for a light-yellow non-crystalline substance found in flowers, and supposed to be widely distributed throughout the Vegetable Kingdom. It is soluble in water, alcohol, and ether, and is turned yellow on the addition of an alkali. Clamier-Marquart called the same substance, Resin of Flowers.

xân-thôl-çin, s. [Formed from Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow.]

Chem.: A yellow colouring matter found in the seed-capsules of Sorghum saccharatum.

xân-thô-lein, s. [Formed from Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow.]

Chem.: A yellow colouring matter obtained from the bark of Sorghum saccharatum. (Watts.)

xân-thô-lite, s. [XANTHOLITES.]

Min.: The same as STAUROLITE (q.v.).

xân-thô-lî-tôg, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Gr. λίθος (lithos) = a stone.]

Palæont.: A genus of Crustacea, with one species, found in the London Clay. (Etheridge.)

xân-thôn-ýk, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Gr. ὄνυξ (onyx) = a claw.]

Zool.: A genus of Helleidæ, with three species, from Mexico. Akin to Vitrina (q.v.), from which it has been separated.

xân-thô-phô-nic, a. [Pref. xântho-, and Eng. phenic.] Containing or derived from phenyl, and yellow in colour.

xanthophenio-acid, s.

Chem.: A yellow colouring matter of unknown composition, obtained by heating phenol or cresol with arsenic acid. It dissolves in water with a golden yellow colour, and in alkalis with a red colour, and dyes silk and wool yellow without the aid of mordants.

xân-thô-phýll, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Gr. φύλλον (phullon) = a leaf.] [CHLOROPHYLL.]

Chem.: The yellow colouring matter of withered leaves. Nothing certain is known respecting its composition, or of the manner in which it is formed from chlorophyll. (Watts.)

xân-thô-phýll-line, s. [Eng. xanthophyll; suff. -ine.]

Chem.: The same as XANTHOPHYLL (q.v.).

xân-thô-phýll-ite, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Gr. φύλλον (phullon) = leaf; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A variety of Seybertite (q.v.) occurring in globular groups of tabular crystals at the Schischinsk Mountains, Slavoust, Orenburg, Russia.

xân-thô-prô-tê-ic, a. [Eng. xanthoprotein; -ic.] Yellow in colour, and containing or derived from protein.

xanthoproteo-acid, s.

Chem.: C₂₄H₂₆N₄O₁₄ (?). Xanthoprotein. A dibasic acid, obtained by the action of nitric acid on albumin, fibrin, casein, and horny matters. It is an orange-yellow amorphous powder, tasteless, inodorous, insoluble in water and alcohol, but forming deep red solutions with aqueous alkalis.

xân-thô-prô-tê-in, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Eng. protein.]

Chem.: Xanthoproteic-acid (q.v.).

xân-thôp-ôis, s. [Mod. Lat. xântho-, and Gr. ὄψις (opsis) = aspect.]

Palæont.: A genus of Crustaceans. Four or five species are known from the London Clay. (Etheridge.)

xân-thô-pý-rî-tôg, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Eng. pyrites.]

Min.: The same as PYRITES (q.v.).

xân-thô-rhâm-nin, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Eng. rhamnine.]

Chem.: C₂₂H₂₉O₁₄ (?). A yellow colouring matter, obtained by boiling coarsely-ground Persian berries with alcohol, filtering, and allowing the filtrate to crystallize. It forms tufts of pale yellow shining crystals, soluble in water and alcohol, insoluble in ether.

xân-thô-rhî-za, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Gr. ῥίζα (rhiza) = a root.]

Bot.: A genus of Rannunculaceæ, tribe Actææ. Sepals five, deciduous; petals five, much smaller than the sepals; ovaries five to fifteen, each with two or three ovules; follicles usually by abortion one-seeded. Xanthorrhiza apiifolia, an undershrub, is one of the plants called in America Yellowroot. Its root, pith, and the inner layers of wood are bright yellow, and were used by the American Indians as a yellow dye. It yields both a gum and a resin, both of them intensely bitter, as are the wood and bark. It is prescribed as a tonic.

xân-thô-rhê-a, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Gr. ῥέω (rheô) = to flow. Named from the yellow juice flowing from them. (See def.)]

Bot.: A genus of Liliaceæ, tribe Aphyllanthæ. Plants botanically of the Lily type, but with longer or shorter arborescent trunks, formed by the bases of leaves glued together with the resin which has exuded from the plant; wiry grass-like pendulous leaves, in a clump at the top of the stem, so as to partly resemble a palm tree. Flowers in a close, scaly spike, the perianth six-leafed, the stamens six, exserted; the fruit a woody, three-celled capsule with a few black seeds, which constitute the Grass Trees of Australia, which, from their being often blackened outside by bush fires, are popularly called also Black Boys. They occur in Australia and Tasmania. Their young leaves are eaten, Xanthorrhiza humilis, the Dwarf Grass-tree, being the species most commonly employed. X. arborea exudes a fragrant resin, smelling like benzoin, and called Botany Bay gum. X. hastilis, according to De Candolle, though an endogen, has an approach to medullary rays. [GRASSTREE.]

xanthorrhœa-resin, s. [ACAROD-RESIN.]

xân-thô-rhî-to, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Eng. orthite (Min.).]

Min.: An altered variety of Allanite (q.v.) containing much water. Colour, yellowish.

xân-thô-sî-a, s. [XANTHOSIA.]

Palæont.: A genus of Malacostraca. Two species are known from the Upper Greensand of England.

xân-thô-si-dêr-ite, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Eng. siderite (Min.).]

Mineralogy:

1. A mineral occurring in stellate and concentric aggregates of fine fibres; sometimes ochreous. Hardness of fibres, 2.5; lustre, silky, sometimes earthy; colour, brownish-yellow to brownish-red; in earthy forms, colours various. Compos.: sesquioxide of iron, 81.6; water, 18.4 = 100, whence the formula Fe₂O₃.2H₂O.

2. The same as COPIAPITE (q.v.).

xân-thô-sis, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow.]

Pathol.: Yellow discoloration in a cancerous tumour.

xân-thô-sô-ma, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Gr. σῶμα (sôma) = body. Named from the yellow stigmas.]

Bot.: A genus of Caladiæ (q.v.). West Indian Aroid plants with erect rootstocks, sagittate leaves, and flowers in a spadix of both sexes. The rootstock of Xanthosoma sagittifolia furnishes starch.

xân-thô-spêr-mois, a. [Pref. xântho-, Gr. σπέρμα (sperma) = seed, and Eng. suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Having yellow seeds.

xân-thô-tân-nio, a. [Pref. xântho-, and Eng. tannic.] Yellow, and containing or derived from tannin.

xanthotannic-acid, s.

Chem.: The name given by Ferrein to the yellow colouring matter of elm-leaves, extracted by alcohol.

xân-thô-our-a, s. [Pref. xântho-, and Gr. οὐρά (oura) = the tail.]

Ornith.: A genus of Corvidæ, founded by Bonaparte, with three species, ranging from equatorial America northwards to Mexico and Texas. Head without crest, bill very stout, rather higher than broad, culmen curved from base; nostrils rather small, oval, concealed by nasal tuft; tail longer than wings, graduated; wings concave, rounded; legs very stout.

xân-thôus, a. [From Gr. ξανθός (xanthos) = yellow.]

Ethnol.: A term applied by Prichard to his yellow-haired variety of the human race, characterized by hair of a reddish, yellowish, or flaxen colour, the iris of the eye of a light blue, generally blue or gray. Typical example, the tribes or individuals of pure Germanic descent.

xân-thôx-ýl, s. [XANTHOXYLON.]

Bot. (Pl.): The order Xanthoxylaceæ (q.v.) (Lindley.)

xân-thôx-ý-lâ-qô-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xanthoxylon (on); Lat. fêc. pl. adj. suff. -acæ.]

Bot.: Xanthoxyla, an order of Hypogynous Exogena, alliance Rutales. Aromatic or pungent trees or shrubs; leaves abruptly or naeously pinnate, more rarely simple, with pellucid dots; stipules wanting; flowers axillary or terminal, often unisexual; asepals four or five, rarely three; petals generally the same number as the sepals, rarely wanting; stamens equal in number to, or twice as many as the petals. Fruit berried or membranous, with two to five cells, sometimes of several drupes, or two-valved capsules; seeds one or two, pendulous. Natives of tropical America, India, China, Africa, &c. Known genera twenty, species 110. (Lindley.)

xân-thôx-ý-lêne, s. [Mod. Lat. xanthoxylon (on); -ene.]

Chem.: C₁₀H₁₆. The volatile oil of Xanthoxylon piperitum (Japan Pepper), first extracted by Steinhause. It is colourless, possesses an aromatic odour, and boils at 162°.

xân-thôx-ý-lin, s. [Mod. Lat. xanthoxylon (on); -in.]

Chem.: The camphor obtained by distilling the bruised seeds of Xanthoxylon piperitum with water. It forms monoclinic crystals, with a milky lustre; insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, melts at 80°, and distils without decomposition.

fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father: wê, wêt, hêre, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pít, síre, sír, marine; gô, pôť, er, wôre, wôřl, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cúb, cûre, únite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ô; ey = â; qu = kw.

xān-thōx'-y-lōn, †xān-thōx'-y-līm, s. [Pref. xantho-, and Gr. ξυλον (xulon) = wood. So named because the roots of the species are yellow.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Xanthoxylaceae (q.v.). Trees, erect or climbing shrubs, often prickly. Leaves compound, pinnate, trifoliate, with the leaflets reduced to one, usually with pellucid dots. Flowers small, unisexual, in axillary or terminal panicles. Sepals five, four, or three; petals and stamens as many; carpels, one to five; fruit splitting in two, with one or two shining black seeds. A large genus, found both in the eastern and western hemispheres, especially in their warmer parts. They are so aromatic and pungent that in the countries where they exist they are popularly called peppers, specially Xanthoxylum piperitum, called Japan Pepper, X. Rhetsa, an Indian species, has small yellow flowers and small round berries, which, when unripe, taste like the skin of a fresh orange. Its fruit, and the seeds and bark of X. alatum, which grows near the base of the Himalays, and those of X. Budrunga, also Indian, are given as aromatic tonics in fever, diarrhoea, dysentery, and cholera. The small branches are employed to make walking-sticks, and the twigs as tooth-brushes. The seeds of X. Budrunga are as fragrant as lemon-peel; X. Clava and X. frazineum (TOOTHACHE-TREE), applied externally to the gums or taken internally, are powerful sudorifics and diaphoretics used in toothache, paralysis of the muscles of the mouth, and rheumatism. The root of X. nitidum is astringent, emmenagogue, &c.; X. caribaeum is a febrifuge; X. piperitum and X. Avicennae are regarded in China and Japan as antidotes to poison. The powdered bark of X. hiemale is given in Brazil in carache; and the capules and seeds of X. hastata are employed in Northern India to intoxicate fiah. The wood of X. hiemale is very hard and suitable for building.

xān-thy'-drīc, a. [Pref. xanth-, and Eng. hydric.] Yellow in colour, and having water in its composition.

xanthydric-acid, s. [PERSULPHO-CYANIC-ACID.]

xō-bēc, s. [Sp. zabeco; Port. zabeco; Fr. shebec; from Turk. zambaki; Pers. zambak; Arab. zambak = a small boat, a pinace; Mod. Arab. shabāk; Isl. zambecco.]

Naut.: A small three-masted vessel with lateen sails, used for coasting voyages in the XEBEC.

Mediterranean and on the ocean-coasts of Spain and Portugal. It differs from the felucca in having square sails as well as lateen sails, the felucca having only lateen sails.

xō-mā, s. [Etyim. not apparent.]

Ornith.: A genus of Larinae, with one species, Xema sabini, Sabine's Gull, from the north temperate zone, and a frequent but irregular visitor to the British Islands. Bill rather shorter than head, moderately stout, upper mandible decurved from beyond the nostrils to the tip, gony angulated and advancing upwards; nostrils basal, lateral, linear; legs moderately long, lower part of tibiae bare for some distance; tarsi tolerably strong; three toes in front entirely palmated; hind toe small, elevated; wings long; tail distinctly forked.

xōn-, pref. [XENO-]

xōn-ō-lā'-pī-a, s. [Gr. = expulsion of strangers.]

Gr. Antiq.: An institution at Sparta, by which strangers were prohibited from residing there without permission, and under which the magistrates were empowered to expel strangers if they saw fit to do so.

xōn'-ī-a, s. [Gr. ξενία (zenia) = the state of a guest.]

Zool.: A genus of Alcyonidae, from the Red Sea and Fiji. The polypae are non-retractile, and situated on a fasciculate and fleshy stem.

xōn'-ī-ūm (pl. xōn'-ī-s), s. [Lat., from Gr. ξένον (zenion) = a gift to a stranger, from ξένος (zenos) = a stranger.]

* 1. Gr. Antiq.: A present given to a guest or stranger, or to a foreign ambassador.

2. Art.: A name given to pictures of still life, fruit, &c., such as are found at Pompeii. (Fairholt.)

xōn-ō-, xōn-, pref. [Gr. ξένος (zenos) = (s.) a guest = friend; (a.) strange, unusual.]

Nat. Science: A prefix denoting (1) likeness as distinguished from identity; (2) having some abnormal process or processes, the meaning in both cases being completed by the last element of the word.

xōn-ō-bāt'-ra-chūs, s. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. βατραχος (batrachos) = a frog.]

Zool.: A genus of Engystomidae, with one species, Xenobatrachus ophidion, from New Guinea.

xōn-ō-cy'-prīd'-in-a, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xeno-cypris, genit. xeno-cyprid(is); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Ichthy.: A group of Cyprinidae; anal rather short; dorsal short, with a bony ray, lateral line running along the middle of the tail. There are three genera: Xenocypris and Paracanthobrama, from China; and Myatacoleucus, from Sumatra.

xōn-ō-cy'-prīs, s. [Pref. xeno-, and Mod. Lat. cypris = Lat. cyprinus (q.v.)] [XENOCYPRIDINA.]

xōn-ō-dērm-īch'-thys, s. [Pref. xeno-; Gr. δέρμα (derma) = skin, and ιχθύς (ichthys) = a fish.]

Ichthy.: A genus placed in the family Alepocephalidae, allied to Alepocephalus (q.v.), the only species known before the voyage of the Challenger. It is a deep-sea fish, found at about 845 fathoms, and having fine nodules instead of scales. (Günther.)

xōn-ō-dō-chē-ūm, xōn-ō-dō-chī-ūm, s. [Gr. ξενοδοχεῖον (xenodocheion), from ξένος (zenos) = a stranger, and δέχομαι (dechomai) = to receive.]

Gr. Antiq.: A name given to a building for the reception of strangers; also applied to a guest-house in a monastery.

* xōn-ōd'-ō-chy, s. [XENODOCHEUM.]

1. Reception of strangers; hospitality.

2. The same as XENODOCHEUM (q.v.)

xōn-ō-gēn'-ō-sīs, s. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. γένεσις (genesis) = origin, source.]

Biol.: A term introduced by M. Milne Edwards to designate that form of biogenesis in which the living parent was supposed to give rise to offspring which passed through a totally different series of states from those exhibited by the parent and did not return into the cycle of the parent. Prof. Huxley remarks that the proper term for this would be heterogenesis, but that unfortunately this term has been employed in a different sense; and after showing that there are analogies both for and against xenogenesis, decides against its known existence. The nearest approach to it is not, as was once believed, in tapeworms, the history of whose transformations has been traced, but in tumours and corns on the animal body or galls on the vegetable leaves or other organs. (Prof. Huxley: Presidential Address, Brit. Assoc. Rep., 1870, p. lxxxv.)

xōn-ō-gē-nēt'-īc, a. [Pref. xeno-, and Eng. genetic.] Of, pertaining to, or produced by xenogenesis.

"I have dwelt upon the analogy of pathological modification which is in favour of the xenogenetic origin of microzymes."—Huxley: Presidential Address, Brit. Assoc. Rep. for 1870, p. lxxxv.

xōn-ō-līte, s. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. λίθος (lithos) = a stone; Gr. xenolith.]

Min.: A variety of Fibrolite (q.v.), possessing a high specific gravity, suggesting a relationship to Kyanite (q.v.); but its optical properties are similar to those of Fibrolite.

xōn-ō-neūr'-a, s. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. νεῦρον (neuron) = a tendon.]

Palaeont.: A genus of Neuroptera, having attached to its wing the remains of a stridulating organ like that of the grasshopper. Found in the Devonian of North America.

xōn-ō-pēl'-tī-dae, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xenopeltis(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.] [XENOPELTIDAE.]

xōn-ō-pēl'-tīs, a. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. πέλτιον (peltē) = a shield.]

Zool.: A genus of Tortricidae, often raised to the rank of a family (Xenopeltidae). Head depressed; upper jaw produced beyond lower; teeth setaceous; no spura at vent. There is but one species, Xenopeltis unicolor (= Tortrix xenopeltis), a curious nocturnal carnivorous snake, ranging from Penang to Cambodia, and through the Malay Islands to Celebes.

xōn-ō-phrys, s. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. ὄφρυς (ophrys) = an eyebrow.]

Zool.: A genus of Pelobatidae (q.v.), with one species, Xenophrys monticola, from the mountains of India.

xōn-ōps, s. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. ὄψ (ops) = the eye, the face.]

Ornith.: A genus of Dendrocolaptidae, with three species from tropical America. The lower mandible is graduated upwards, while the upper is quite straight.

xōn-ōp'-tēr-ūs, s. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. πτερόν (pteron) = a wing, a fin.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Tetradontinae, or a subgenus of Tetradon, from the Indian Archipelago. The species are distinguished by their funnel-shaped nostrils, and the small dermal ossifications which have two or three roots, and form spines over the skin.

xōn-ō-pūs, s. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. πούς (pous) = a foot.]

Zool.: A genus of Aglossa, family Dactyletrichidae, with three species, from tropical Africa.

xōn-ō-rhī'-na, s. [Pref. xeno-, and ρίσις (rhisis), genit. ῥήσιν (rhīsin) = the snout.]

Zool.: A genus of Apura, with one species, Xenorhina oxycephala, from New Guinea. Ears perfect, tongue free in front. By some authors raised to the rank of a family, by others merged in Engystomidae.

xōn-ōs, s. [Gr. ξένος (zenos) = a guest, a stranger.]

Entom.: A genus of Stylopidae. A species discovered by Rossi parasitic on a wasp, Polistes galliæ, led to the establishment of the order Strepsiptera.

xōn-ō-time, s. [Baudant, who named it, gives the etymology as Gr. κενός (kenos) = vain, empty, and τιμή (timē) = honour; but, as Dana suggests, the word being misapplied from the first, the derivation should be accepted as ξένος (zenos) = a stranger to, and τιμή (timē) = honour.]

Min.: A tetragonal mineral occurring mostly in crystals. Hardness, 4 to 5; sp. gr., 4.45 to 4.66; lustre, resinous; colour, shades of brown, reddish, yellowish; opaque. Compos., phosphoric acid, 37.86; yttria, 62.14 = 100, yielding the formula 3YPO5.

xōn-ūr'-ūs, s. [Pref. xen-, and Gr. οὐρά (oura) = a tail.]

1. Zool.: A genus of Dasypodidae, with three species ranging from Guiana to Paraguay.

2. Palaeont.: Remains have been found in the Post-Pliocene Cavea of Brazil.

xōn'-yī, s. [Gr. ξένος (zenos) = a stranger; -yī.] [DIPHENYL.]

xōn'-yī-a-mīne, s. [Eng. xenyl, and amine.]

Chem.: C12H11N. Martylamine. A crystalline body found in the basic oil which is obtained as a bye-product in the manufacture of aniline. It forms white shining scales, slightly soluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, melts at 45°, boils at 320°, and distils without decomposition.

xōn'-y-lēn'-īo, a. [Eng. xenyl; -en, -ic.] Pertaining to or containing xenyl (q.v.)

bēl, bōy; pōut, jōw1; cat, çell, chorus, çin, bench; go, gom; thin, this; sin, ap; expeot, Xenophon, exist. -īng. -ōian, -tlan = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -cious, -tious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

xenylenic-alcohol, s.

Chem.: $C_{12}H_{10}O_2 = (C_{12}H_8)_2O_2$. Diphenylalcohol. Diphenylic acid. A diatomic alcohol obtained by the action of water on diazobenzidine dinitrate. It crystallizes in small white needles slightly soluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, and melts when heated. It dissolves readily in potash and in strong ammonia.

xēr-ân-thēm-ō-sē, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xeranthem(um); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -es.]

Bot.: A sub-tribe of Compositæ, tribe Cynareæ. Heads many-flowered, discoid, the marginal flowers feminine, the others hermaphrodite.

xēr-ân-thē-mūm, s. [Gr. ξηρός (xēros) = dry, and άνθος (anthos) = a flower.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Xeranthemæ (q. v.). Leaves whitish and cottony beneath, the involucre imbricated, the ray coloured. Composites of the kind called "Everlasting Flowers" from Continental Europe and the Levant.

xē-rā-āī-a, s. [Gr. ξηρασία (xerasia) = dryness.]

Pathol.: A species of Alopecæ, characterized by the dryness and powdery appearance of the hairs, which are generally split at the tops.

xēr-ō-nē, s. [ZERENE.]

xēr-ō-s, s. [Sp.] Sherry. So called from the district of Spain where it is produced. [SHERRY.]

xēr-īf, s. [SHERREFF.]

xēr-īf, s. [TURK.]

1. A gold coin formerly current in Egypt and Turkey, value 9s. 4d.

2. A name for the ducat in Morocco.

xēr-ō-cōl-lūr-ī-ūm, s. [Gr. ξηρός (xēros) = dry, and κόλλυριον (kollyrion) = an eye-salve.] A dry collyrium or eye-salve.

xēr-ō-dēr-ma, s. [Pref. zero-, and Gr. δέρμα (derma) = skin.]

Pathol.: Dryness of the skin.

xēr-ō-dēs, s. [Gr., from ξηρός (xēros) = dry.] Any tumour attended with dryness.

xēr-ō-myr-ūm (yr as ir), s. [Gr. ξηρός (xēros) = dry, and μύρον (myron) = an ointment.] A dry ointment.

xēr-ōph-ā-gy, s. [Gr. ξηρός (xēros) = dry, and φαγειν (phagein) = to eat.] A term applied by early ecclesiastical writers to the Christian rule of fasting; the act or habit of living on dry food or a meagre diet.

Xerophagy, i. e., eating food not moistened by flesh broth, juicy fruit, or vinous ingredient, was distinctly new.—Smith: Diet. Christ. Biog., 1. 327.

xēr-ōph-thāl-my, xēr-ōph-thāl-mī-a, s. [Lat. xerophthalmia, from Gr. ξηροφθαλμία (xerophthalmia): ξηρός (xēros) = dry, and ὀφθαλμός (ophthalmos) = the eye.]

Pathol.: A dry, red soreness, attended by itching of the eye, not without swelling or discharge of humours.

xēr-ō-site, s. [Gr. ξηρός (xēros) = withered, decayed; suff. -ite (Petrol.)]

Petrol.: A name given by Hatty to a decomposed porphyritic diorite.

xēr-ō-tēs, s. [Gr. ξηρότης (xērōtis) = dryness.]

Pathol.: A dry habit or disposition of the body.

xēr-ūs, s. [Gr. ξηρός (xēros) = withered, haggard.]

Zool.: A genus of Sciuirinae, with a few species, from Africa, where they burrow in the ground or among the roots of trees or bushes. There are two pairs of pectoral teats; tail comparatively short; fur mixed with flattened spines. The best-known species, Xerus rutilans, is about twenty inches long, of which the tail forms nine; reddish-yellow above, paler on sides, whitish below.

xī-mēn-ī-a, s. [Named after Francis Ximenes, a Spanish monk, who wrote a work upon Mexican plants in 1615.]

Bot.: A genus of Olacaceæ, with three or four known species. Large shrubs or small trees, often spinous. Leaves entire, leathery; calyx very small, petals four, hairy inside; stamens eight, ovary with four cells, each one-seeded. Ximenesia americana, the False Sandal-wood, is a straggling Indian shrub, producing dull-white fragrant flowers, smelling like cloves, succeeded by small, oval, red or yellow pulpy fruits, an inch long, aromatic, but somewhat austere. They are eaten by the Hindus, and by the natives of Ceylon. The kernels taste like filberts.

xīph-ī-ās, s. [Lat., from Gr. ξίφιας (xiphias) = as adj., sword-shaped; as subst. = a sword-fish.]

1. Ichthy.: A genus of Xiphidæ (q. v.), distinguished by the absence of ventral fins. The best known species is Xiphias gladius, the Common, or Mediterranean Sword-fish. Günther says that the distinction of species is beset with great difficulties, owing to the fact that but few specimens exist in Museums, and because the form of the dorsal, the length of the ventrals, and the shape and length of the sword appear to change according to the age of individuals.

2. Astronomy.

(1) [DORADO, II. 1.]

(2) A comet shaped like a sword.

xī-phīd-ī-ōn, s. [Gr. ξίφιδιον (xiphidion) = a small sword, dimin. from ξίφος (xiphos) = a sword.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Blenniidæ, from the Pacific coast of North America. Allied to Centronotus (q. v.).

xī-phīd-ī-ūm, s. [XIPHIDION.]

Bot.: A genus of Wachenborfæ. Liliaceous plants from South America. Simple stems, ensiform leaves, and somewhat secund nodding pedicels of blue or white flowers.

xī-phī-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xiphias]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

1. Ichthy.: The sole family of the Acanthopterygian division, Xiphiformes (q. v.), with two genera, Histiophorus and Xiphias (q. v.). The upper jaw is produced into a long cuneiform weapon.

2. Palæont.: From the Chalk and the London Clay of Sheppey.

xīph-ī-ī-for-mēs, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. xiphias = a sword-fish, and forma = form, appearance.]

Ichthy.: A division of Acanthopterygian Fishes, with a single family, Xiphidæ (q. v.).

xīph-ī-stēr-nūm, s. [Gr. ξίφος (xiphos) = a sword, and στερνόν (sternon) = the breast.]

Compar. Anat.: The metasternum or ensiform process of the sternum; corresponding with the xiphoid cartilage in man.

xīph-ō, pref. [Gr. ξίφος (xiphos) = a sword.] Sword-shaped; having a sword-shaped process or processæ.

xīph-ō-cō-lāp-tēs, s. [Pref. xīpho-, and Gr. κολάπτis (kolaptis) = a chisel.]

Ornith.: A sub-genus of Dendrocolaptes, with five species ranging from Mexico to Bolivia. The sub-genus was established by Leeson for those species which have the bill bent.

xīph-ō-dōn, s. [Pref. xīpho-, and Gr. ὀδών (odōn), genit. ὀδόντος (odontos) = a tooth.]

Palæont.: The type-genus of Xiphodontidæ (q. v.), from the Eocene. The species were small, two-toed mammals, with a short tail, and long, slender limbs. Dentition complete; molars of a generalised selenodont type.

xīph-ō-dōn-tī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xiphodon, genit. xiphodon(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Palæont.: A family of Artiodactyle Ungulates, with three genera, Xiphodon, Cainotherium, and Microtherium, from the Eocene and Miocene of France. The species were probably intermediate between the Suidæ and the Tragulidæ.

xīph-ō-gād-ūs, s. [Pref. xīpho-, and Mod. Lat. gādus.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Ophidiidæ (q. v.), with a single species, confined to the East Indies. Body naked; a pair of canines developed in both jaws.

xīph-ō-gor-ēī-a, s. [Pref. xīpho-, and Gr. γοργειός (gorgaios) = of or belonging to the Gorgon.]

Zool.: A genus of Gorgonidæ, from the warmer seas. The polypes form straight, sword-shaped masses.

xīph-ōid, a. [Gr. ξίφος (xiphos) = a sword, and είδος (eidos) = form, appearance.] Resembling a sword; shaped like a sword; ensiform.

xīphoid-cartilage, s. [ENSIFORM-CARTILAGE.]

xīph-ōid-ī-an, a. [XIPHOID.] Of or pertaining to the xiphoid cartilage.

xīph-ōph-ūl-lōūs, a. [Pref. xīpho-, and Gr. φύλλον (phullon) = a leaf.]

Bot.: Having ensiform leaves.

xīph-ōp-ter-ūs, s. [Pref. xīpho-, and Gr. πτερόν (pteron) = a wing, a fin.]

Palæont.: A genus of Trichluridæ, of Eocene age.

xīph-ō-sūr-a, s. pl. [Gr. ξίφος (xiphos) = a sword, and ὀυρά (oura) = a tail.]

1. Zool.: An order or sub-order of Mero-stomata (q. v.). Anterior segments welded together to form a broad, convex buckler, upon the dorsal surface of which are placed the compound eyes and ocelli, the latter in the centre, the former nearly so. Mouth furnished with a small labrum, a rudimentary metastoma, and six pairs of appendages. Posterior segments more or less free, having on their ventral surfaces a series of broad, lamellar appendages; telson ensiform. Only one recent genus, Limulus (q. v.).

2. Palæont.: Fossil genera numerous, from the Upper Silurian to the Tertiary. (See extract under XIPHOSURAN.)

xīph-ō-sūr-an, s. [XIPHOSURA.] Any individual of the Xiphosura (q. v.).

"In the Devonian no certain traces of Xiphosurans have yet been detected, but several types occur in the Carboniferous."—Nicholson: Palæont., 1. 385.

xīph-ō-teū-thīs, s. [Pref. xīpho-, and Mod. Lat. teuthis (q. v.).]

Palæont.: A genus of Belemnitidæ, with one species, from the Lias. Shell with a long phragmacone, enveloped in a calcareous sheath.

xī-phūd-ri-a, s. [Gr. ξίφιδριον (xiphudrion), dimin. from ξίφος (xiphos) = a sword, . . . a mussel-shell.]

Entom.: A genus of Uroceridæ (q. v.). Antennæ short, head round, neck long, maxillary palpi with five joints; larva boring into the wood of the beech, the oak, the poplar, the willow, &c. The typical species is Xiphudria camelus. It is black, with white spots on the top of the head and along the sides of the abdomen, and red legs. Length, about half an inch. This species, and another, X. dromedarius, are British.

xōn-ālt-ite, s. [After Tetela de Xonalta, Mexico, where found; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: A massive mineral found associated with apophyllite and bustamites. Sp. gr. 2.71; colour, white to gray; tough. Compa. = silica, 49.80; lime, 46.47; water, 3.73 = 100, equivalent to the formula $4CaSiO_2 + HO$.

xū-lī-nōe-pri-ō-nī-tēs, s. [Gr. ξύλινος (xulinos) = wooden; πίριον (prion) = a saw, and suff. -ites.]

Palæobot.: A genus of fruits with valvées, woody, two-seeded legumes. The pericarp unites in a singular manner the characters of a legume and a drupe. Two species are known. Xulinosprionites latus has the legume short and broad, with the apex umbonate, the epicarp rugose and mmutilated, the sarcocarp thin, and the endocarp thick. X. zingiberiformis has the legume lomentaceous, irregular; the epicarp somewhat coriaceous, the sarcocarp pithy, the cells very large, the endocarp thick. Externally it looks like a piece of ginger-root, and it is not till it is fractured that it is found to be a legume. Both species are from the London Clay of Sheppey. (Bowerbank: Fossil Fruits.)

xī-lān-thrax, s. [Pref. xy(ō), and Gr. άνθραξ (anthrax) = coal or charcoal.]

Petrol.: Wood coal or charcoal, in distinction from mineral coal.

fāto, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

x̄y-lār'-y-a, s. [Fem. of Mod. Lat. xylarius = growing in woods, from Gr. ξύλον (xulon) = wood.]

Bot.: A genus of Sphaeriaceae. Branched, horny, or fleshy fungals, often with clavate lobes, whitish and mealy when young, afterwards brown or black. Perithecia horny, usually immersed all over the branches; centre black, composed of asept, with eight usually nonseptate spores. The largest species are tropical, but several are found in Britain on rotten wood, stumps of trees, &c. The most common is Xylaria hypoxylon.

x̄y-lóm, s. [Gr. ξύλη (xulē) = timber.]

Bot.: Naegeli's name for one of two groups into which the permanent tissues of a fibrovascular bundle can be divided. It is composed of parenchymatous cells, wood fibres, vascular cells, and true vessels, in which the walls of the cells generally become ligneous. From it the wood is developed.

xylem-parenchyma, s.

Bot.: The medullary rays. (Thomé.)

x̄y-lóne, s. [Gr. ξύλον (xulon) = wood; suff. -ene.]

Chem.: $C_6H_{10} = C_6H_4(CH_3)_2$. Dimethylbenzene. A colourless, volatile liquid found in that portion of light coal-tar oil which distils over between 136° and 141°. It admits of three isomeric modifications, depending on the relative position of the two methyl atoms: viz., orthoxylene, prepared synthetically by the action of sodium on a mixture of orthobromotoluene and methylic iodide, boils at 140-141°; metaxylene, obtained by distilling xylol or mesitylene acid with lime, boils at 137°; and paraxylene, prepared by the action of sodium on bromotoluene and methylic iodide, boils at 136-137°. On passing xylene through a red-hot tube, it is resolved into benzene, toluene, and other hydrocarbons.

xylene-diamine, s. [XYLYLENE-DIAMINE.]

xylene-sulphochloride, s.

Chem.: $C_6H_5SClO_2 = C_6H_5(CH_3)_2SO_2Cl$. A yellow oil obtained by tritulating xylene-sulphate of sodium with phosphorus pentachloride, warming the mixture, and pouring the product into water.

xylene-sulphuric acid, s.

Chem.: $C_6H_{10}SO_3 = C_6H_5(CH_3)_2SO_3H$. Xylolsulphuric acid. Sulphoxylic acid. Produced by the action of concentrated sulphuric acid on xylene. It is very soluble in water, and by dry distillation is converted into xylene. With the oxides it forms salts called xylene-sulphates, its potassium and sodium salts being soluble in water and alcohol, and crystallizing from the latter in silky laminae.

x̄y-lén-ól, s. [Formed from Gr. ξύλον (xulon) = wood, and Eng. suff. -ol.]

Chem.: $C_6H_{10}O = C_6H_4(CH_3)_2OH$. Dimethyl-phenol. An eight-carbon phenol, produced by fusing oxy-mesitylenic acid with potash. It melts at 75°, and boils at 213-5°.

x̄y-lén-yl, s. [XYLYL.]

x̄y-lén-yl'-a-mine, s. [Eng. xylenyli, and amine.] [XYLYDINE.]

x̄y-leu'-tes, s. [Gr. ξύλευμαι (xuleuomai) = to gather wood.]

Entom.: A genus of Zeuzeridae. Xyleutes cossus is a modern name for the Goatmoth (q.v.), better known as Cossus ligniperda.

x̄y-lī-a, s. [Gr. ξύλον (xulon) = wood.]

Bot.: A genus of Eumimoseae, having sessile, sickle-shaped, compressed, woolly legumes, with partitions between the seeds. Xylia dolabriformis (= Mimosa xylocarpa of Roxburgh), the Ironwood tree of Peru and Aracana, a large deciduous tree growing in India and Burmah, yields a red resin, and oil is expressed from its seeds. The wood is very durable; it has been used in India and Burmah for railway sleepers, piles and beams of bridges, telegraph-posts, the handles of agricultural implements, boat-building, &c.

x̄y-līc, a. [Gr. ξύλον (xulon) = wood; suff. -ic.] Derived from wood.

xylidic acid, s.

Chem.: $C_2H_7O_2 = CO \cdot OH \cdot CH_2 \cdot CH_3$. Prepared from brom-metaxylene by the action of sodium and carbonic anhydride. It crystallizes in large monoclinic prisms, slightly soluble in water, more so in alcohol, and melts at 126°.

x̄y-līd'-a-mine, s. [XYLYDINE.]

x̄y-līd'-ic, a. [Eng. xyl(ic); suff. -id, -ic.] Derived from wood.

xylidic acid, s.

Chem.: $C_6H_5O_4 = C_6H_5(CH_3)(CO \cdot OH)_2$. Obtained by oxidising pseudo-cumene, xylidic acid, and paraxylidic acid with dilute nitric acid. It forms colourless crystals, slightly soluble in water, and melts at 280° to 283°.

x̄y-lī-dine, s. [Eng. xyl(ene); suff. -id, -ine.] [XYLYDINE.]

Chem.: $C_6H_{11}N = C_6H_5(NH_2)$. Amidoxylene. Amidoxylol. Xyleylamine. A base homologous with aniline, produced by the action of ammonium sulphide or stannous chloride on nitroxylylene. It is a colourless liquid, heavier than water, and boiling at 215°. Heated with tin and hydrochloric acid, it solidifies on cooling to a crystalline mass, which appears to be a compound of xylidine hydrochlorate with stannous chloride.

x̄y-līn-a, s. [Lat. xylinum; Gr. ξύλον (xulon) = cotton.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Xyliniidae (q.v.). Antennae slightly ciliated in the male; abdomen depressed, somewhat crested; forewings narrow, elongate, the edges nearly parallel. British species three, the Conformist, Xylina conformis, the Nonconformist, X. zinckenii, and the Gray Shrouder Knot, X. rhizolitia.

x̄y-līn'-y-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xylina(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Noctuidae. Antennae generally ample; thorax thick; often crested anteriorly; wings folded in repose like a flattened roof. Caterpillar long, smooth, generally brilliantly coloured. British genera, six; species, nineteen. [SHARK-MOTH.]

x̄y-līte, s. [Gr. ξύλον (xulon) = wood; suff. -ite (Min.); Ger. xylit.]

Min.: Probably a hydrous Asbestos, according to Dana.

x̄y-lō, pref. [Gr. ξύλον (xulon) = fire-wood, wood, [timber, a tree.] Of, belonging to, or derived from wood.

xylol-quinone, s. [PHLORONE.]

x̄y-lō-bāl'-sa-mūm, s. [Gr. ξύλον (xulon) = wood, and βάλσαμον (balsamon) = balsam.]

1. The wood of the balsam-tree.

2. A balsam obtained by decoction of the twigs and leaves of Amyris gileadensis in water.

x̄y-lō-bī-ūs, s. [Pref. xylol, and Gr. βίος (bios) = life.]

Palæont.: A genus of Chilognatha, family Archiulidae. Segments divided by cross-striae into numerous fragments. Several species occur in the Carboniferous rocks of Nova Scotia, and one in those of Scotland. The type is Xylobius sigillariae, of the Nova Scotia Coal-field, found by Sir J. W. Dawson in the hollow trunks of Sigillaria, &c. Xylobius is the earliest known representative of the Myriapoda.

x̄y-lō-cām'-pā, s. [Pref. xylol, and Gr. κάμπε (kampe) = a caterpillar.]

Entom.: A genus of Xyliniidae, with one British species, Xylotampa lithorhiza, the Early Gray Moth. The long caterpillar feeds exposed on honeysuckle in June, July, and August.

x̄y-lō-carp, s. [XYLOCARPUS.]

Bot.: A hard and woody fruit.

x̄y-lō-car'-pūs, a. [XYLOCARPUS.] Having fruit which becomes hard or woody.

* x̄y-lō-car'-pūs, s. [Pref. xylol, and Gr. καρπός (karpos) = fruit.]

Bot.: A genus of Trichilidae (q.v.), now generally combined with Carapa (q.v.).

x̄y-lō-chlōre, s. [Pref. xylol, and Gr. χλωρός (chlōros) = green.]

Min.: The same as OXHAVERITE (q.v.).

x̄y-lō-chlōr'-ic, a. [Pref. xylol, and Gr. χλωρός (chlōros) = green.] (See compound.)

xylolohloric acid, s.

Chem.: Fordos' name for the green colouring matter of decayed wood. It may be extracted by chloroform.

x̄y-lōc'-ō-pā, s. [Gr. ξύλοκοπος (xulokopos) = hewing or felling wood; ξύλον (xulon) = wood, and κοπή (kopē) = a cutting.]

Entom.: A large genus of Scopulipedes, with sharp-pointed mandibles by which they bore holes in timber. In several species the females are black, while the males are bright-yellow. [CARPENTER-BEE.]

x̄y-lō-crŷpt'-ite, s. [Pref. xylol; Gr. κρυπτός (crŷptōs) = concealed, hidden, and suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as SCHEERERITE (q.v.).

† x̄y-lō-dī-ūm, s. [Gr. ξύλιδης (xulōdēs) = hard as wood, woody; pref. xylol, and Gr. εἶδος (eidos) = form.]

Bot.: An Achenium (q.v.).

x̄y-lō-graph, s. [Gr. ξύλον (xulon) = wood, and γράφω (graphō) = to write, to draw.] An engraving on wood, or an impression from such an engraving.

* Some of the xylographs of the first edition of the British Pauperism.—Saturday Review, March 23, 1864, p. 420.

x̄y-lōg'-rā-phēr, s. [Eng. xylograph; -er.] One who engraves on wood.

* A paper was read by Mr. George Clulew, xylographer.—Athenaeum, May 17, 1864, p. 664.

x̄y-lō-grāph'-ic, x̄y-lō-grāph'-ic-al, a. [Eng. xylograph; -ic, -ical.] Pertaining or relating to xylography (q.v.).

x̄y-lōg'-rā-phŷ, s. [Eng. xylograph; -y.]

1. A mode of printing or graining from the natural surface of the wood. A piece of wood is selected of fine quality, having the pattern of grain desired. The surface is treated chemically to open the pores. After it is dry the surface is painted and a sized sheet of paper laid over the board, and both run together between rollers in the manner of copperplate printing. The paint is then transferred to the board, the differences in the absorbent qualities of the board determining the depth of colour. The paper is laid face downward on the article to be ornamented, and rubbed on the back with a soft pad to transfer the impression.

2. A name given to a process of decorative painting on wood. A selected pattern or design is drawn on wood, which is then engraved, or the design is reproduced in zinc by the ordinary method. An electrolyte cast is taken from the wood or zinc plate, and smooth surfaces of wood are printed from the stereotype under regulated pressure with pigments prepared for the purpose. The colour penetrates the wood, leaving no outside film, and after being French-polished, or covered with a fluid enamel, the wood may be rubbed, scrubbed, or even sand-papered without destroying the pattern. (Ure.)

x̄y-lō-īd, s. [XYLYDINE.]

Chem.: Löwig's name for the radicle xylol, C_6H_9 .

x̄y-lōld, a. [XYLYDINE.] Having the nature of wood; resembling wood.

x̄y-lō-ī-dīn, s. [Gr. ξύλον (xulon) and εἶδος (eidos) = form, appearance.]

Chem.: $C_6H_9NO_7 = C_6H_9(NO_2)_2O_5$. Pyroxam. Nitramid. Explosive starch. An explosive compound, discovered by Braconnot in 1833, and prepared by tritulating starch with fuming nitric acid till it is reduced to a semi-fluid mass, and adding twenty-five parts of water. It is a white, inodorous, and tasteless powder, insoluble in water, alcohol, ether, and chloroform, slightly soluble in glacial acetic acid. When struck with a hammer it detonates, melts when heated, and bursts into flame at 180°, leaving a carbonaceous residue. 100 parts of starch yield 130 parts of xylolidin.

x̄y-lō-ī-dīne, s. [XYLYDINE.]

Chem.: The same as XYLYDINE (q.v.).

x̄y-lōl, s. [Gr. ξύλον (xulon) = wood; suff. -ol.] [XYLYNE.]

x̄y-lōl-sūl-phŷr'-ic, a. [Pref. xylol, and Eng. sulphuric.] Derived from or containing xylene and sulphuric acid.

δῶν, βῶν; πῶν, ῥῶν; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bengh; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = l. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -cious, -tious. -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = del, dēl.

xyloisulphuric acid, s. [XYLENE-SULPHURIC ACID.]

xy-lô-mê-lûm, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. μηλον (mêlon) = an apple.]

Bot.: A genus of Grevillia (q.v.). Australian trees, with opposite leaves, axillary spikes of flowers, and very thick, woody fruit, inversely pear-shaped. One species, Xylo-melum pyriforme, is cultivated in British greenhouses.

xy-lô-pâl, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Eng. opal.] Min.: The same as WOOD-OPAL (q.v.).

xy-lô-pô-sô, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xylop(ta); Lat. fem. pl. adj. anfr. -ex.]

Bot.: A tribe of Anonaceae: stamens indefinite in number; ovules, few or many, inserted in the ventral suture of the fruit.

xy-lôph'-a-ga, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. φαγειν (phagêin) = to eat.]

1. Entomology (As a Plural):

(1) A section of Securifera, including those Sawflies the larvae of which burrow in the woody portions of plants instead of eating the leaves. [Staicinae, Urocenidae.]

(2) A sub-tribe of Rhynchophora, comprehending those weevils which, both in their immature and in their perfect state, bore into the solid wood of trees.

2. Zool.: A genus of Pholadidae (q.v.), with two species, from Norway, Britain, and South America. Shell globular, with a transverse furrow; anterior margin reflected, covered by two accessory valves within which the animal is included, except the contractile siphons. The species burrow in floating wood and in timbers which are always covered by the sea.

xy-lôph'-a-gan, s. [XYLOPHAGA.] Any animal of the group Xylophaga.

xy-lôph'-a-gî, s. pl. [XYLOPHAGA.]

Entom.: A sub-tribe of Beetles, tribe Tetramera, instituted by Latreille, and approximately equal to the family Scolytidae (q.v.).

xy-lô-phâg'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xylophag(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Diptera, now reduced to a sub-family. Xylophaginae, or Xylophagidae (q.v.).

xy-lô-phâ-gî-næ, xy-lô-phâg'-i-dæg, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xylophag(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ, or masc. & fem. -idæ.]

Entom.: A sub-family of Stratiomyidae, having seven or eight free abdominal segments. The larvae are believed to live in rotten wood. Some South American species are an inch and a quarter long.

xy-lôph'-a-goûs, a. [XYLOPHAGA.] Feeding on and boring into wood.

Chelura tenabraria is one of the most injurious xylophagous crustaceans known. It is commonly found associated with another wood-borer, the Limosina lignorum.—Cassell's Nat. Hist., vi. 212.

xy-lôph'-a-gûs, s. [XYLOPHAGA.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Xylophaginae (q.v.). The larvae live in dead and decaying wood or in garden mould. There are a dozen or more species in North America. The adults bear a remarkable resemblance to certain hymenopterous insects.

xy-lô-phâ-sî-a, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. φάσις (phasis) = appearance.]

Entom.: A genus of Night Moths, family Apamiidae. Antennae long, pubescent in the male; abdomen long, crested; fore wings long, more or less denticulated. British species six, the type being Xylophasia polyodon, the Dark Arches, a night moth having the fore wings grayish-brown, with four transverse, toothed, paler lines, and with two black streaks from the base, and another from the centre of the wing; expansion of wings an inch and three-quarters to two inches. Common.

xy-lôph'-i-lan, s. [Mod. Lat. xylophil(i); Eng. suff. -an.]

Entom.: Any individual belonging to the Xylophili (q.v.).

xy-lôph'-i-li, s. pl. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. φιλος (phîlos) = to love.]

Entom.: A section of Lamellicorn Beetles, including Macleay's Dynastidae and Rutelidae (q.v.).

xy-lôph'-i-loûs, a. [XYLOPHILI.] Growing upon or feeding on wood.

xy-lô-phôno, s. A musical instrument consisting essentially of a row of parallel bars of wood, of graduated lengths, which are played upon with small mallets.

xy-lôph'-yl-la, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. φύλλον (phullon) = a leaf.]

Bot.: A genus of Phyllanthus (q.v.), sometimes reduced to a sub-genus of Phyllanthus. Shrubs, without leaves, but with leaf-like branches bearing the flowers on notches in their margin. Natives of the tropics, especially of the West Indies, where they are called Sessida Laurela and Love-flowers.

xy-lô-pî-a, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. πίκος (pîkos) = sharp, bitter.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Xylopes (q.v.). Trees or shrubs, with oblong or lanceolate leaves and axillary bracteate peduncles, one or many flowered; calyx three to five-lobed, the segments ovate, acute, coriaceous; petals, six, in two rows, the outer three the largest; stamens, many, inserted into a globose receptacle; carpels, two to fifteen, each with one or two seeds. Known species about twelve, some of which are often placed in the genus Habzelia (q.v.). Natives of South America and the West Indies. They readily strike root when a small fragment of them is placed in the ground.

Xylopias sericea, the Pindaiba of Rio Janeiro, bears a highly aromatic fruit, which may be used as pepper, with which it agrees in its flavour. Good cordage is made from the fibres of its bark. The wood, bark, and berries of X. glabra, the Bitter-wood of the West Indies, taste like orange-seeds, and impart a similar flavour to the wild pigeon which feed on them. It is said to be useful in colic and for creating an appetite. Martius believes the fruit of X. grandiflora to constitute a valuable febrifuge used by the South American Indians. The dry fruits of X. aromatica form the Piper ethiopicum of commerce, used as pepper by the West African negroes.

xy-lô-py-rôg'-ra-phÿ, s. [Gr. ξύλον (xulon) = wood; πύρ (pur), genit. πύρος (pyros) = fire, and γράφω (graphô) = to write, to draw.] The act or art of drawing poker-pictures (q.v.).

xy-lô-rêt'-in-ite, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Eng. retinite; Ger. xyloretin.]

Min.: A hydrocarbon compound obtained by the action of alcohol on fossil pine-wood. Massive, but crystallizes in needles of the orthorhombic system from a naphtha solution. Colour, white.

xy-lôs'-tê-in, s. [Mod. Lat. xylosteum (see def.); Eng. suff. -in.]

Chem.: A glucoside obtained from the berries of the Fly Honeysuckle (Lonicera Xylosteum). It is non-volatile, very bitter, insoluble in water, very soluble in alcohol and ether, and yields sugar when decomposed by acids.

xy-lô-têch-nô-graph'-i-ca, s. [Pref. xylo-; Gr. τέχνη (tekhne) = an art, and γραφικός (graphikos) = capable of drawing or painting.] The art of staining wood in colors.

xy-lô-tile, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. τίλος (tilos) = a fibre.]

Min.: A doubtful mineral; according to Dana is probably but an altered asbestos.

xy-lô-trû'-pês, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. τρύπαια (trupaiâ) = to bore, to pierce.]

Entom.: A genus of Dynastidae or Dynastinae, formerly merged in Dynastes. It includes large lamellicorn beetles. Xylotrupes gideon, a native of Malacca, attacks the cocoanut palm.

xy-lÿl, s. [Gr. ξύλον (xulon) = wood; suff. -yl.]

Chem.: C₅H₉. The hypochietic radicle of xylene.

xy-lÿl'-a-mine, s. [Eng. xylyl, and amine.]

Chem.: This name belongs to a base, C₆H₅H₂N = C₆H₄($\frac{CH_3}{CH_2}$)₂ (not yet obtained), related to benzylamine, C₇H₇H₂N, in the same manner as xyloidine, C₆H₅(NH₂) = C₆H₄(NH₂) $\frac{CH_3}{CH_2}$ is related to toluidine, C₆H₄(NH₂) $\frac{CH_3}{CH_3}$. (Hantz.)

xy-lÿl'-ène, s. [Eng. xylyl; -ene.]

Chem.: C₆H₆. A diatomic radicle related to xylyl, C₆H₅, in the same manner as ethylene is related to ethyl. (Watts.)

xylylene-diamine, s.

Chem.: C₆H₁₂N₂ = C₆H₁₀(NH₂). Xylylene-diamine. A crystalline compound formed by the action of tin and hydrochloric acid on dinitroxylylene. It is soluble in water and alcohol, insoluble in ether.

xy-lÿl'-ic, a. [Eng. xylyl; -ic.] Pertaining to, or containing xylyl.

xylylic acid, s.

Chem.: C₉H₁₀O₂ = C₆H₅(CH₃)₂CO₂H. A crystalline body obtained by oxidizing comena with potassium dichromate and sulphuric acid. It is sparingly soluble in boiling water, very soluble in alcohol and ether, melts at 103°, and boils at 273°. On treating it with chromic acid, it is converted into insolonic acid.

xyr'-id, s. [XYRIDAE.]

Bot. (Pl.): The order Xyridaceae (q.v.). (Lindley.)

xyr'-i-dâ'-pô-sô, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xyris, genit. xyrid(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. anfr. acææ.]

Bot.: Xyrida; an order of Endogens typical of the alliance Xyridales. Herbaceous, sedge plants, with fibrous roots; leaves radical, ensiform, or filiform, with enlarged, scarious, sheathing bases; flowers in terminal, imbricated, scaly heads; sepals three, glumaceous; corolla gamopetalous, with three thin, long, and coloured petaloid divisions; fertile stamens three, others, alternate with the divisions of the corolla, sterile; style trifid; ovary single, one-celled, with parietal placentae bearing numerous ovules; fruit capsular, three-valved. Chiefly natives of the Tropics. There are two genera, Aboloba and Xyris (q.v.).

xyr'-id-âl, a. [XYRIDALES.]

Bot.: Of or belonging to the genus Xyris, or to the order Xyridaceae, as the xyridal alliance. (Lindley.)

xyr'-i-dâ'-lêg, s. pl. [Masc. & fem. pl. of Mod. Lat. xyridalis.]

Bot.: Lindley's fourteenth alliance of Endogens. Hypogynous, bisexual, tripetaloid Endogens, with copious albumen. It contains four orders, Philydraceae, Xyridaceae, Comelyaceae, and Mayaceae. (Lindley.)

xyr'-is, s. [Lat., from Gr. ξύρις (xuris) = a kind of flag, Iris fatioidissima.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Xyridaceae (q.v.). Sedge-like plants, with narrow, radical leaves, and acapes bearing heads of yellow, fugaceous flowers. Known species about fifty, chiefly from tropical America, but a few from the hotter parts of the Eastern Hemisphere. The leaves and root of Xyris indica are given in India against ringworm, itch, and leprosy; those of X. americana and X. vaginata are used for the similar purpose, the former in Guisna, the latter in Brazil.

xy-s-ma-lô'-bi-ûm, s. [Gr. ξύσμα (xysma) = a filing, a shaving, and λοβός (lobos) = a legume, a pod. So named because the fruits are covered with scales.]

Bot.: A genus of Asclepiadaceae. Erect perennial shrubs with large flowers in umbels; corolla bell-shaped, with spreading segments, staminal corona at the top of the tube of filaments, consisting of ten parts in a single series. Known species eight or nine, all but one from the Cape of Good Hope. The remaining one, Xysmalobium Heudelotianum, is from Sengambia, but its root is eaten by the negroes. X. padiifolium is cultivated in English gardens.

xyst, xÿst'-ôs, xÿst'-ûs, s. [Lat. xystus, from Gr. ξύστος (xystos), from ξύω (xuô) = to scrape, from its smooth and polished floor.]

Anc. Arch.: A sort of covered portico or open court of great length in proportion to the width, in which the athletes performed their exercises.

xy-s-taroh, s. [Gr. ξύστος (xystos), and ἀρχω (archô) = to rule.]

Gr. Antiq.: An Athenian officer who presided over the gymnastic exercises of the xyst (q.v.).

xy-s-têr, s. [Gr., from ξύω (xuô) = to rub, to scrape.]

Surg.: An instrument for scraping bone.

fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hêre, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pôt, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrkh, whô, sôn; mûnte, cûb, cûre, unte, cûr, rûle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ê; ey = â; qu = kw.

Y.

Y, the twenty-fifth letter of the English alphabet is, in modern English, both a consonant and a vowel. It is taken from the Latin, into which language it was adopted from the Greek Υ (υ) or Υ (υ). It sometimes represents the Anglo-Saxon γ , which is supposed to have had a sound resembling that of the French u or German $ü$.

I. At the beginning of syllables, and when followed by a vowel, y is a palatal consonant, being formed by bringing the middle of the tongue in contact with the palate, nearly in the position to which the g hard brings it. Hence, the A.S. hard g has often been softened to y , as in day = A.S. dag, may = A.S. maþ, &c. In words of Romance origin y frequently represents:

1. French -ie = Lat. -ia, as in barony, company, copy, jolly, family, memory, victory, &c.
2. Lat. -ium, as augury, horology, remedy, study, &c.
3. Lat. -atus, as attorney, deputy, ally, quarry.
4. Fr. -if; Lat. -ivus, as hasty (= O. Fr. hastif), jolly (= Mid. Eng. jolif; O. Fr. joli, fam. jolive), testy, &c.
5. Many words ending in y have come through Lat. nouns in -ia (= Fr. -ie), from Gr. -ia, -eia, as analogy, apology, blasphemy, philosophy, &c.
6. As an adjectival termination, y generally represents the A.S. -ig, as in stone = A.S. stānig, hungry = A.S. hungrip. So also in some nouns it represents A.S. -ig, as in honey = A.S. hunig. In the suffix, -ly it is both an adjectival and an adverbial suffix, and represents the A.S. -lic, -ice, or -iche, as godly = A.S. godlic, friendly = A.S. frēondlic, hardly = A.S. hardlice. In nouns ending in -ly, this ending represents the Fr. -le, Lat. -latem (nominative -las), as in vanity (= Fr. vanité, Lat. vanitatem, accus. of vanitas), calamity, &c.

II. In the middle, and at the end of words, y is a vowel, and is precisely the same as i . When accented it is pronounced as i long, as in day, my, &c., and when unaccented as i short, as in glory, joy, &c.

Y was sometimes called the Pythagorean letter, from its Greek original in its form of three lines representing the sacred triad formed by the dual proceeding from the monad.

1. As a symbol: In chem., Y is the symbol of Yttrium (q.v.).
2. As a numeral: Y stands for 150, and with a dash over it (\bar{Y}) for 150,000.

Y, pref. [See def.] A common prefix in Mid. Eng. words, and representing the A.S. -e or ge, as in yeft, yclad. It is the same as GE (q.v.).

Y, s. Something resembling, in shape, the letter Y ; as a forked pipe or coupling of that form, a set of railroad tracks in the form of a triangle (used instead of a turntable), &c.

ya, adv. [YEA.]

yac'-q-ré, s. [JACARX.]

yac'-ca, s. [Native name.] (See etym. and compound.) yacca-wood, s.

Bot. & Comm.: The wood of Podocarpus coriacea, used in the West Indies as an ornamental timber for cabinet work.

yächt (ch silent), * yacht, s. [Dut. yacht (formerly apelt yacht), so named from its speed, from Dut. jagen (formerly jachtin) = to speed, to hunt; yacht (formerly yacht) = a hunting, from jagen = to hunt or chase deer, hare, &c.; gogn. with Ger. jagen = to hunt; probably allied to Ger. jäh; O. H. Ger. gāhi = quick, sudden, rash; Ger. gehen = to go; Dut. gaan, gaen = to go. (Skeat.)] A decked pleasure vessel; a light and elegantly fitted-up vessel, used either for racing or for pleasure trips, or as an official or state vessel to convey royal personages or Government officials from place to place. The rigs are various, and many pleasure yachts now have steam-power as an accessory, or for use during calms.

Racing yachts are built with very fine lines, enormous spars and sails, and have the hull deeply ballasted, thus sacrificing everything to speed. The centre-board yachts of the United States are unsurpassed for speed.

yacht-club, s. A club or society of yacht-owners for racing purposes, &c., commanded by a commodore.

yächt (ch silent), v.t. [YACHT, s.] To sail or cruise about in a yacht.

yächt'-ër (ch silent), s. [Eng. yacht; -er.] One who commands a yacht; one who sails or cruises about in a yacht.

yächts'-man (ch silent), s. [Eng. yacht, and man.] One who keeps a yacht; one who is skilled in the management of a yacht.

yächts'-man-ship (ch silent), s. [Eng. yachtsman; -ship.] The art or science of sailing or managing a yacht.

† yächts'-wom-an (ch silent), s. [Eng. yacht, a., and woman.] A woman skilled in or fond of yachting.

"It (the Sea-Eagle) is much exposed to the attacks of marauding yachtsmen, and yachtswomen."—Illustration, Sept. 1, 1883, p. 294.

ya-cú-ma'-ma, s. [South Amer. Indian = Mother of Water.]

Anthrop.: The Watermamma (q.v.).

* yáf, pret. of v. [GIVE.]

* yáf, v.i. [From the sound made.] [YAP.] To bark like a dog in a passion; to yelp; hence, to talk pertly. (Scotch.)

yáf'-fie, yáf'-fil, yáf'-flin-gale, yáf'-fler, s. [For etym. see def. and extract.]

Ornith.: Provincial names for Gecinus viridis, the Green Woodpecker, from its ordinary cry, which is a cheerful, laughing call, several times repeated, and which was formerly believed to be a sure sign of rain.

"'Faf!' or 'Yafingale' refers to the bird's common cry, which has been well compared by Gilbert White and many others to the sound of laughter."—Farrall: Brit. Birds (ed. 4th) II. 461.

yä'-gër, s. [Ger. jäger = a huntsman, from jagen = to hunt.] A member of certain regiments of light infantry in the armies of various German states. The name is derived from their being originally composed of jägers or huntsmen. [Cf. CHASSEUR.]

yäg'-gër, s. [Dut. jager = a huntsman, a driver.] [YACER.] A wanderer about the country; a travelling pedlar. (Scotch.) yä'-hoó, s. [A word of no etymology.] A name given by Swift in his Gulliver's Travels to a race of brutes, described as having human forms and vicious and degraded propensities. They were subject to the Houyhnhnms, or horses endowed with human reason. Hence the term is applied to a rough, low, boorish, or uneducated person.

"The passionate exclamation of a mere yahoo of a stable-boy."—Graves: Spiritual Quixote, bk. IV, ch. X.

† Also used adjectively.

"That hated animal, a yahoo squire."—Watson: Newmarket, 170.

Yaj'-ür, * Yaj'-üsh, s. [Sansk. yaj = to sacrifice.] (See etym. and compound.)

Yajur-Veda, s.

Hindoo Sacred Literature: The third portion of the Veda, generally called the third Veda. It consists not merely of verses from the Rig Veda, but also of prose sentences used at the offering of certain sacrifices. There are two editions called the Black and the White Yajur. [VEDA.]

yak, s. [Native name.]

Zool.: Poephagus († Bos) grunniens, a species of ox from the mountainous regions of Tibet. There are two races: the wild yak, generally black, which is found near the snow line, descending into the valleys in winter, and a domesticated race of various colours, black and white being most common. The yak is about the size of the common ox, to which it has a general resemblance, but it is covered with a thick coat of long, silky hair, hanging down like the fleeces of a sheep, completely investing the tail, and forming a lengthy fringe along the shoulders, flanks, and thighs. Mr. Bartlett considers that this fringe, which exists in both races, was developed as a protection to the animal in its alpine haunts, as the long hair forms a sort of mat which defends the body from the effects of cold when the animal is reposing in the snow. The domesticated race is of great importance to the natives of Tibet. The yak is employed as a beast of burden, but never for tillage or draught; the milk is very rich, and yields excellent butter; the flesh is of the finest quality, and that of the calves far superior to ordinary veal. The hair is spun into ropes, and made into coverings for tents, and the soft fur of the hump and withers is woven into a fine strong cloth. The tails, often dyed red, are made into the chowries, or fly-flappers, used in India. Yaks are often seen in zoological gardens and menageries, and have repeatedly bred in Europe, and it is probable that they might be advantageously introduced into the Highlands of Scotland and the northern parts of the Continent of Europe.

yak-lace, s. A coarse strong lace made from the hair of the Yak (q.v.).

yald, a. [YELD, a.]

* yald, * yalde, pret. & pa. par. of v. [YIELD.]

yald, yauld, a. [Icel. gildr = stout, brawny, strong; Dan. & Sw. gild.] Supple, active, athletic. (Scotch.)

yall, a. [YELD, v.]

* yalte, pret. of v. [YIELD.]

yám, s. [Fr. igname; Sp. name, from Port. ñame, probably from some African language.]

Botany:

1. The root of various species of Dioscorea, of which more than 150 are known, also the plants themselves. They are herbs or undershrubs with fleshy tuberous roots, stems twining to the left hand; leaves generally alternate, marked entire, and with several strongly marked veins running throughout their entire length. Inflorescence consisting of spikes of small unisexual flowers, with a perianth enclosing in the males six stamens and in the female a three-celled ovary. They are chiefly natives of America and of Asia, but a few are African, and three or four Australian.

The Common Yam, Dioscorea caliva, is a native of Malabar, Java, and the Philippines; D. alata of the Moluccas and Java; D. globosa, D. purpurea, D. rubella, D. fasciculata of India; D. Batatas of China and Japan; but most of these are now introduced into tropical countries to which they are not indigenous. The largest of the esculent roots of the several species of yam are two or three feet across, occasionally reaching thirty pounds weight. They are used as substitutes for potatoes in the regions where they grow. They are eaten either roasted or boiled, and the flower also is made into bread and puddings.

2. (Pl.) The order Dioscoreaceæ. (Lindley.)

yám'-q-dóu, s. [Guia'an name.]

Bot.: A name expressed from the seeds of Myristica sebifera, a tree about ten feet high, growing in Guiana.

yám'-ór, yám'-mër, yam-our, yom-er, v.t. [A.S. geómerian = to lament, from geómer (O. L. Ger. jámar, O. H. Ger. jámarer) = laments; O. H. Ger. jámaron = to lament; Ger. jammeren.] To lament, to fret, to cry, to yell, to whine. (Scotch or Provincial.)

"The child . . . does yammer constantly, that can't be denied."—Miss Fernier: Marriage, ch. xix.

* yane, v.t. [YAWN, v.]

yánk (1), s. [YANK, v.]

- 1. A jerk, a twitch. (Amer.)
- 2. A quick, sharp stroke or blow. (Scotch.)
- 3. (Pl.) A kind of leggings. (Prov.)

yánk (2), s. An abbreviation of Yankee (q.v.).

yánk, v.t. & t. (Etyim. doubtful; perhaps a nasalized form akin to Ger. jagen = to hunt.) [YACHT.]

A. Transitive:

- 1. To twitch or jerk powerfully. (Amer.)
- 2. To snatch away unexpectedly. (Amer.)

B. Intransitive:

- 1. To work cleverly and actively. Often with on: as, She yanked on at the work.
- 2. To speak in a yelping or affected tone; to scold, to nag.

Yán'-keò, s. & a. [A word of doubtful origin. According to Mr. Heckewelder (Indian Nations, p. 112, quoted in Bartlett: Dict. of Americanisms, s.v.), the word was the first effort of the Indians "to imitate the sound of the national name of the English, which they pronounced Yengoes." According to Dr. W. Gordon (Hist. Amer. War, 1789, i. 324-5, quoted by Skeat), it was a favourite cant word in Cambridge, Mass., as early as 1713, and meant "excellent," as a yankee good horse, yankee good rider, &c. He supposes that it was adopted by the students there as a by-word, and, being carried by them from the college, obtained currency in the New England colonies, until at length it was taken up in other parts of the country, and applied to New Englanders generally as a term of slight reproach. Skeat, with reference to this account of the origin of the word, compares Lowland Scotch ganke = a sharp, clever, forward woman; yanker = an agile girl, an incessant talker, also = a smart stroke, a great falsehood, the fundamental idea being that of quick motion. [YACHT, s., YANK (1), s.] Webster refers to another etymology: that it is "a corruption of Janekin, a dimin. of John, a nickname given to the English colonists of Connecticut by the Dutch settlers of New York;" but this is rejected by Skeat as looking "very like a pure invention."]

A. As substantive:

1. The popular name for the citizens of New England, but frequently applied by foreigners to all the inhabitants of the United States. During the American Revolution it was applied to all the insurgents, and during the Civil War it was the term commonly applied by the Confederate soldiers to the Federals.

2. A glass of whiskey sweetened with molasses. (Amer.)

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the Yankees, or Americans.

Yankee-doodle, s.

1. The name given to a famous air, now regarded as the national air of the United States. Very many accounts have been given of its origin: some have professed to trace it to the time of the Great Rebellion, and have asserted that "Nanke Doodle" was a nickname for Cromwell, and that the rhyme

"Nanke Doodle came to town, on a little pony,
He stuck a feather in his cap, and called him macaroni" referred to his entry into Oxford. The term "macaroni" sufficiently confutes the theory, for the Macaroni Club did not come into existence till the middle of the eighteenth century. In all probability the tune is of English origin, and not more than a hundred and fifty years old. The first mention of it in print is said to occur in the Boston Journal of the Times for September, 1768:

"Those passing in boats observed great rejoicings, and that the Yankee Doodle song was the capital piece in the band of music."

The words, probably composed by Dr. Schuckburg who served under General Amherst, in the French and Indian war of 1755, are now never heard. According to Mr. Barclay Squire,

"as a melody it has little beyond simplicity in its favour, but there is a quaint direct and incisive character about it which redeems it from vulgarity, besides which the historical associations of the tune, connected as it is with the establishment of American Independence, should have saved it from some of the criticisms to which it has been subjected." (Grove: Dict. Music.)

2. A Yankee.

Yankee-doodledom, s. A term occasionally applied by the people of the Southern States to New England.

Yankee-gang, s. An arrangement in a saw-mill (Canada) adapted for logs of 21 inches diameter and under. It consists of two sets of gang-saws, having parallel ways to the immediate vicinity of each other. One is the slabbing-gang, and reduces the log to a balk and slab-boards. The balk is then shifted to the stock-gang, which rips it into lumber.

Yán'-keò'-fiéd, a. [Eng. Yankee; fy, -ed.] Like a Yankee; after the Yankee fashion.

"The Colonel whittled away at a bit of stick in the most Yankee way possible."—A Stray Yankee in Texas, p. 114. (Bartlett.)

Yán'-keò'-ísm, s. [Eng. Yankee; -ism.] An idiom or practice of the Yankees.

"Approaching very fast the sublime of yankeism."—Thomas Moore: Diary, vii. 231.

yán'-kér, yán'-kie, s. [YANK, v.]

* 2. A long piece of timber, as a rafter or the like.

3. A pole or rod for measuring a yard; a yard-stick or yard-measure.

4. The British and American standard of measure, being equal to three feet or thirty-six inches. [MEASURE, s., † 1.; FOOT.] As a cloth measure the yard is divided into four quarters = sixteen nails. A square yard contains nine square feet, and a cubic yard twenty-seven cubic feet. A yard = 91'4392 centimetres, a square yard = 8361'13 square centimetres, and a cubic yard = 764,585 cubic centimetres.

"For if I measure anything by a yard, I know whether the thing I measure be longer or shorter than that supposed yard, though perhaps the yard I measure by be not exactly the standard."—Locke: On Hum. Underst., bk. II., ch. xxviii.

5. The male organ of generation, the penis.

II. Naut.: A spar along from a mast and serving to extend a sail. Yards are either square, lateen, or log-sail. Yards for square sails are suspended across the mast at right angles, and are of a cylindrical form, tapering from the middle, which is termed the alings, towards the extremities, which are called the yard-arms.

yark, v.t. [YERK.]

yar-kú, s. [See def.] The native name of different South American monkeys of the genus Pithecia.

yarn, yarne, s. [A.S. gearn, gern; cogn. with Dut. garen; Icel. Dan., & Sw. garn; Ger. garn. Allied to Gr. χορδή (chordé) = a string; orig. = a string of gut; Icel. görn, garnir = guts. From the same root come cord, chord, yard, garden, &c.]

I. Literally:

1. Any textile fibre prepared for weaving into cloth. [THREAD.] Cotton yarn is numbered according to the number of hanks contained in a pound of 7,000 grains. Each hank, or skein, measures 840 yards. Worsted yarn has 560 yards to the skein; woolen yarn has 1,600 yards to the skein or run. Linen yarn is wound upon reels, and made up into leas, hanks, and bundles. Flax and jute yarn is numbered according to the number of leas of 300 yards per pound.

"All the yarns she spun."
—Shakesp.: Coriolanus, l. 2.

* 2. A net made of yarn.

"They catch it in their net, and do sacrifice unto their yarn."—Becon's Works, l. 464.

3. In rope-making, one of the threads of which a rope is composed.

II. Figuratively:

* 1. The material of which anything is composed.

"In this house the yarn of life was of a mingled quality."—De Quincey: Spanish Nun.

2. A story spun out by a sailor; a long story or tale, especially one of doubtful truth or accuracy: To spin a yarn = to tell a long story. (Coloq.) yarn-clearer, s. A fork or pair of blades, set nearly touching, so as to remove buria or unevenness from yarn passing between them.

yarn-dresser, s. A machine for sizing and polishing yarn.

yarn-meter, s. A counter to show the quantity of yarn each spindle has been making.

yarn-printer, s. A machine for printing warps previous to weaving. This plan is adopted with some kinds of cheap goods to make stripes against the fabric, as with common carpets. A cheap kind of figured tapestry-carpet is also made by printing in the patterns so as to come right when the warp is raised up in loops upon the face of the goods.

yarn-reel, s. A machine for winding yarn from the cop or bobbin.

yarn-scale, s. One for showing the weight of a certain length of yarn, say a hank.

yarn-spooler, s. A winding machine for filling spools or bobbins for shuttles or other purposes.

yarn, v.t. [YARN, s.] To spin a yarn; to tell tales. (Often with idea of exaggeration.)

"[He] who has yarned aforetime 'On the Folk's Head' and 'Round the Galley Fire.'"—Daily Telegraph, Dec. 29, 1855.

yave, pret. of v. [GIVE.]

yaw (1), s. [JAW.]

yáw (2), s. [YAW, v.]

* 1. Ord. Lang.: A deviation out of one's course. "O the yaws that she will make!"
—Massinger: A Very Woman, III. 5.

2. Naut.: A temporary deviation of a ship or vessel from the direct line of her course.

"Then, giving the ship a yaw, poured the whole discharge, as he thought, right into his wretched victim!"—Cassell's Saturday Journal, Sept. 19, 1855, p. 802.

yaw-weed, s.

Bot.: Morinda Royce, a shrub about eight feet high, with white flowers, growing in the West Indies. [MORINDA.]

yáw (3), s. [YAWS.]

yáw (1), v.t. & t. [Norw. gaga = to bend backward; gag = bent backwards; Icel. gagr = bent back; Bavarian gagen = to move unsteadily. "Prob. a reduplicated form of go; hence, to keep going." (Skeat.)]

A. Intransitive:

Naut.: To steer wild; to deviate from the line of course in steering. (Said of a ship.) (Murray: Frank Mildmay, ch. xx.)

* B. Trans.: To move about unsteadily; to move to and fro.

"[She] yaw'd her head about all sorts of ways."
—Hook: Sailor's Apology for Bow Legs.

yáw (2), v.t. [YAWS.] To rise in blisters; breaking in white froth, as cane-juice in the sugar-works.

* yáwd, s. [YAUD.]

yáwl, yaul, s. [Dut. jol = a yawl, a kiff; cogn. with Dan. jolle; Sw. julle = a yawl. "The Dan. jolle has been corrupted into English jolly-boat." (Skeat); Icel. jula.]

Nautical:

(1) A dacked boat carrying two masts, one of which is near the stern. It is usually lugger or cutter-rigged, the after-mast, called a jigger, being the smaller.

"The yawl is chiefly the pleasure-craft, the deadly fighting vessel."—Daily Telegraph, Nov. 12, 1855.

(2) A ship's boat; a jolly-boat, usually from twenty-three to twenty-eight feet long, and one quarter to one third that breadth of beam. In the British navy it is the fifth boat in point of size; the others being the launch, long-boat, barge, and pinnace.

"The yawl, however, was immediately manned and sent to her assistance."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. I., ch. ii.

yáwl, yaule, yole, goule, youle, v.t. [Icel. gaula = to howl, bellow; Norw. gaula = to bellow, low, roar. Allied to yell.] To howl, to cry out, to yell.

"Three howling Selles yawling round about."
—Fairfax: Godfrey of Boulogne, IV. 2.

yáwn, yane, yawne, v.t. [A.S. gánlan = to yawn; cogn. with O.H. Ger. gēnon; Ger. gähnen; cf. A.S. ginnan (in corrupt. tógnan = to gape widely); pat. gán; Icel. gína = to gape, yawn; pat. gein; Gr. χαίρω (cháirō) = to gape; Lat. hō = to gape. From the same root come chaos, chasm, hiatus, &c.]

1. To gape; to have the mouth open involuntarily through drowsiness, dulness, or fatigue; to oacitate.

"The god . . . ask'd the dame (And asking yawn'd) for what intent she came."
—Dryden: Ovid; Ceyx & Alcione, 307.

2. To open the mouth voluntarily.

"The crocodiles not only know the voice of the priests when they call unto them, and endure to be handled and stroked by them, but also yawn and offer their teeth unto them to be picked and cleaned with their hands."—P. Holland: Flutarch, p. 794.

3. To gape; to open wide. (Said of the mouth, a chasm, or the like.)

"Graves yawn and yield your dead."
—Shakesp.: Much Ado, v. 2.

* 4. To gape for anything; to express desire by yawning.

"The chiefest thing at which lay reformers yawn."—Hooker: Eccles. Politic.

* 5. To open the mouth as in surprise or bewilderment; to gape.

"The affrighted globe Should yawn at alteration."—Shakesp.: Othello, v. 2.

yáwn, s. [YAWN, v.]

1. The act of yawning; a gaping; an involuntary opening of the mouth from drowsiness, dulness, or fatigue.

2. The act of gaping or opening wide.

"Sure 'tis the friendly yawn of death for me."
—Congreve: Mourning Bride.

* 3. An opening, a chasm. (Marston.)

yáwn-íng, yan-íng, pr. par., a., & a. [YAWN, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & partic. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of one who yawns; a yawn.

"With affected yawnings at the close."
—Dryden: Hind & Panther, III. 1291.

† Physiologically, yawning is an inspiration, deeper and longer continued than a sigh, drawn through the widely open mouth, accompanied by a peculiar depression of the lower jaw, and frequently by an elevation of the shoulders. (Foster.)

yáwn-íng-ly, adv. [Eng. yawning; -ly.] In a yawning manner; with yawns or gapes; drowsily.

"Leaning upon your idle elbow yawningly patter out those prayers whose sound or sense ye understand not."—Ep. Hall: The Hypocrite.

yáws, s. [From a West African negro word yaw = a raspberry.]

Pathol.: A disease in which, without premonitory symptoms, portions of the skin, especially about the face, the scalp, the axilla, and the genitals, become covered with small, dusky red spots, which develop into raspberry or mulberry-like tubercles, sometimes ulcerating. The malady may continue for many years, or for life. It occurs chiefly in the West Indies, North America, and Africa. Called also Frambesia and Pian.

"A mysterious malady referred to as 'yaws.'"—M. Collins: Thoughts in my Garden, l. 54.

* yclād, a. [Pref. y-, and Eng. clad.] Clad, clothed.

"Her words yclad with wisdom's majesty." Shaksp.: Henry VI., l. 1.

* yclēpēt, * yclēpt, pa. par. [A.S. ge-clēpōd, pa. par. of geclēpian = to call.] Called, named.

"Judas I am, yclēpēt Maccaburus." Shaksp.: Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

* y-dle, a. [IDLE.]

* y-drad, pret. & pa. par. of e. [DREAD, e.]

yē, pron. [A.S. ye (nom.), eower (gen.), eow (dat. & acc.); cogn. with Dut. gij = ye, u = you; Icel. er, ter = ye, ýðhar = your, ýðhr = you; Dan. & Sw. i = ye, you; Ger. ihr; O. H. Ger. ir = ye, iwar, iwer = your; iū = you; Goth. jus = ye, izwara = your, izwis = you.] Properly the nominative plural of thou, the second personal pronoun, you being the dative and accusative, and your the genitive. But in later times ye was used as an objective as well as a nominative. Ye is now almost obsolete except in sacred or solemn writings or addresses, its place being taken by you. [You, Your.] The confusion between ye and you did not exist in Old English. Ye was always used as a nominative, and you as a dative or accusative. In the English Bible the distinction is very carefully observed; but in the dramatists of the Elizabethan period there is a very loose use of the two forms. Not only is you used as nominative, but ye is used as an accusative. (Morris: Hist. Outlines of English Accidence, § 155.)

"Vain pomp and glory of the world, I hate ye." Shaksp.: Henry VIII., iii. 2.

* yē, adv. [YEA.]

yēa, * ya, * yē, adv. & s. [A.S. geā = yea; cogn. with Dut. Dan., Sw., & Ger. ja; Icel. ja; Goth. ja, jai; allied to Goth. jah; O. Sax. gia, ja; A.S. ge = also, and.]

A. As adverb:

1. A word expressing affirmation or assent; yes; ay; the opposite of noy.

"Let your conversation be yea, yea, ay, ay."—Matt. v. 27.

"Originally yea, like nay, was used in reply to questions framed in the affirmative: as, Will he go? Yea (or nay). Yea and no, on the contrary, were used in questions framed negatively, as, Will he not go? Yea (or no). Yea was also used as a strong asseveration, often accompanied by an oath. The distinction between yea and yes was becoming neglected as early as the time of Henry VIII. Yea is now used only in writings or speeches of a solemn or sacred style.

2. Formerly used to introduce a subject with the sense of indeed, verily, truly, is it so? or, it is so.

"Yea, hath God said ye, shall not eat of every tree in the garden?"—Genesis iii. 1.

3. Used as = nay, to reprove, or notice, or amplify what has gone before; not this alone; not only so but also; ay.

"I therein do rejoice; yea and will rejoice."—Ps. l. 18.

B. As substantive:

1. An affirmative; one who votes in the affirmative or in favour of any question or motion; an ay or aye.

2. In Scripture, used to denote certainty, consistency, harmony, and stability.

"All the promises of God in him are yea, and in him are amen."—2 Corinth. i. 20.

* yea-forsooth, a. A term applied to one saying to anything yea and forsoth, which latter was not a term of genteel society; hence, low, vulgar.

"A rascally, yea-forsooth knave."—Shaksp.: Henry IV., l. 2.

* yēad, * yeade, * yede, v. t. [A fictitious present tense and infinitive, formed from the old pa. t. yode, ede.] [YEDĒ.] To go, to proceed, to move along.

"Theo hadd the kught his Lady yede aloof." Spenser: F. Q., l. xi. 8.

yēan, v. t. & t. [A.S. eānan = to ean; geānan = to yeon; from eānan = pregnant, prop. pa. par. of the lost verb eācan = to increase, to augment; eācan = to increase, to eke.] To bring forth young, as a sheep or lamb; to ean. [EKE.]

"There were serious complaints from those few districts where Dorset horns flock yeon thus early."—Daily Telegraph, March 14, 1887.

yēan-līng, s. & a. [Eng. yeon; dimin. suff. -ling.]

A. As subst.: The young of sheep; a lamb, an ealing.

"To their store They add the poor man's yeanting." Ben Jonson: Sad Shepherd, l. 1.

B. As adj.: Lately yeanned; young.

"To gorge the flesh of lambs or yeanting kids." Milton: P. L., iii. 484.

year, * yeer, * yer, * yere, s. [A.S. gēar, gēr = a year, pl. gēar; cogn. with Dut. jaar; Icel. ár; Dan. ár (sing.) & Goth.; Sw. år; O. H. Ger. jār, Ger. jahr; pl. jār; allied to Gr. ἔτος (hōros) = a season, a year; ἔρα (hōra) = a season, an hour; Lat. hora; Eng. hour. As in Anglo-Saxon so in early times, the word was unaltered in the plural; like sheep, deer; as, "This seven year" (Shaksp.: Much Ado, iii. 3); hence the modern phrase, a two-year old colt," and the like.]

1. A unit of time, marked by the revolution of the earth in its orbit. The year is either astronomical or civil. The former is determined by astronomical observation, and is of different lengths, according to the point of the heavens to which the revolution is referred. When the earth's motion is referred to a fixed point in the heavens, as a fixed star, the time of revolution is the time which elapses from the moment when the star, the sun, and the earth are in a straight line, till they again occupy the same position: this is called a sidereal year. If the revolution is referred to one of the equinoctial points, the year is somewhat shorter than the sidereal year, on account of the precession of the equinoxes, that is, the retrogression of the equinoctial points along the ecliptic. This is called the equinoctial, tropical, or solar year. The length of the sidereal year is 365.256.612 mean solar days, or 305 days, 6 hours, 9 minutes, 9.6 seconds. The length of the solar or equinoctial year is 365.2422414 mean solar days, or 365 days, 5 hours, 48 minutes, 49.7 seconds. The difference between these two years is 19 minutes 19.2 seconds mean solar time, that being the time required for the earth to advance in its orbit a distance of 50" of arc. The civil year is the year of the calendar. It contains a whole number of days, beginning always at midnight of some day. According to the present system, or according to the Gregorian calendar, every year the number of which is not divisible by 4, also every year which is divisible by 100, and not by 400, is a common year, and contains 365 days. All other years are called leap years, and contain 366. The ecclesiastical year is from Advent to Advent. A lunar year is a period consisting of twelve lunar months. The astronomical lunar year consists of twelve lunar synodical months, or 354 days, 8 hours, 48 minutes, 36 seconds. The common lunar year consists of twelve lunar months or 354 days. The legal year in England, up till 1752, was from March 25 to March 25; now it is from Jan. 1 to Jan. 1. The Embolismic, or Intercalary lunar year, consists of 13 lunar civil months, and contains 384 days.

2. The period in which any planet completes a revolution: as, the year of Jupiter or of Saturn.

3. (Pl.) Used as equivalent to age, or old age.

"Myself am struck in years, I must confess." Shaksp.: Taming of the Shrew, II.

¶ (1) Anomalistic year: [ANOMALISTIC YEAR].

(2) Gregorian year: [GREGORIAN].

(3) Julian year: [JULIAN].

(4) Sabbatical year: [SABBATIC].

(5) Year and a day:

Law: The lapse of a year with one day added to it; a period which determines a right or works prescription in many cases.

(6) Year day and waste:

Law: Part of the sovereign's prerogative in England, whereby he was entitled to the profits for a year and a day of the tenements of persons attainted of petty treason or felony, together with the right of wasting the said tenements; afterwards restoring it to the lord of the fee. It was abolished by the Felony Act, 1370.

(7) Year of grace: Any year of the Christian era.

(8) Year to year tenancy:

Law: A tenancy taken at first for a year, but which continues for a second year unless one of the parties on the expiration of the first six months intimates to the other his intention not to renew it. The same rule will obtain year after year till the six months' notice of non-renewal is given.

year-book, s.

1. A book published annually, each issue containing new or additional information; a work published each year, and intended to supply fresh information compiled up to date on matters in regard to which changes are continually taking place.

"Not simply a year-book, as its name implies, but a year-book compiled by one who knows the meaning of the facts and figures which he has so laboriously put together."—Globe, March 24, 1868.

2. A book containing annual reports of cases adjudged in the courts of England, from the time of Edward II. to that of Henry VII. inclusive, and published annually.

"The reports are extant in a regular series from the reign of King Edward the second inclusive; and from his time to that of Henry the eighth were taken by the protonotaries, or chief scribes of the court, at the expense of the crown, and published annually, whence they are known under the denomination of the year-books."—Blackstone's Comment. (Introduct., § 8.)

* year's mind, * year-mind, s. Here, mind means memorial rather than wish or intention. Hence, the original meaning of year-mind was that of a memorial, often a mass, a year subsequent to the decease of the individual to whom it was devoted. Or it might mean an anniversary; cf. month's mind.

* yeared, a. [Eng. year; -ed.] Numbering years; aged.

"Year'd hut to thirty." Ben Jonson: Sefanus, l. 1.

* year-ly-ly, adv. [Eng. yearly; -ly.] Yearly; year by year.

"The great quaking-grass sown yearly in many of the London gardens."—Johnson: Herbals.

I. Ordinary Language:
 1. To the same sense as II. 1.
 2. Spume or foam of water.
 "Now the ship boring the moon with her mainmast, and anon swallowed with yest and froth."—Shakspeare: Winter's Tale, iii. 3.
II. Technically:
 1. Chem.: Barm. The yellowish, viscid substance deposited from beer, or which rises to the surface of saccharine solutions during the process of fermentation. Under the microscope, it appears as a mass of round or egg-shaped cells, termed Torula, containing granular matter. These exist either single or associated in heaps or strings, each cell having an average diameter of $\frac{3}{1000}$ of an inch, and consisting of a thin-walled sac or bag containing protoplasm. Yeast is the potent agent in the production of alcohol from sugar, each molecule of sugar splitting up into alcohol and carbonic anhydride, by a process which is not clearly understood. Heated to a temperature of 40°, its efficiency is almost entirely destroyed; but, when deprived of its water by straining and strong pressure, and kept in a cool place, it retains its properties unaltered for ten or twelve days. When washed with alcohol, dried at a low temperature, and mixed with a little starch, it retains the power of setting up the alcoholic fermentation for several months. Grape-juice, and several other vegetable juices, when left for a few days at a suitable temperature, develop yeast cells in great abundance, without any addition of yeast, probably from the presence of spores in the surrounding atmosphere. In bread-making, yeast, both in its liquid and dried states, is added with warm water to flour to give a start to the fermentation process, thereby supplying carbonic-acid gas, which communicates a spongy or light texture to the bread. It is also essential to the production of wine from grape juice and other fruit juices, the manufacture of beer, and the preparation of distilled spirits.
 2. Pharm.: Beer yeast, when applied externally, acts as a stimulant and antiseptic.

As a poultice it corrects the discharges of interdent ulcers. It has been given also internally in low states of the system, but with doubtful efficacy. (Garrod.)
¶ (1) Artificial yeast: Dough mixed with a small quantity of common yeast, made into cakes, and dried.
(2) German yeast: Common yeast drained and pressed till nearly dry. In this state it can be kept for several months, and is much used by bakers.
(3) Patent yeast: Yeast collected from a wort of malt and hop, and prepared in the same manner as German yeast. [Y (2).] yeast-bitten, a.
Brewing: Too much affected by yeast.
 "When the process of attenuation becomes so slack as not to exceed half a pound in the day, it is prudent to cleanse, otherwise the top-barm might re-enter the body of the beer, and it would become yeast-bitten."—Ire.
yeast-plant, s.
Bot.: Torula or Saccharomyces cerevisiae. [TORULA.]
yeast-powder, s. A substitute for yeast used in leavening bread, consisting of a preparation of soda, phosphates, and other substances, in the form of a powder.

A. & B. As pr. par. & particp. adj.: (See the verb).
C. As subst.: The act or noise of one who or that which yells; a yell.
 "With wailing great, and women's shrill yelling The roofs gan roar; the air resound with plaint." Surrey: Virgile: Æneis, iv.
yēll-ōch (ch guttural), v.t. [YELL, v.] To yell, to scream, to shriek. (Scotch.) yēll-ōch (ch guttural), s. [YELLOCH, v.] A yell, a scream, a shriek. (Scotch.)
yēl-lōw, yel-ow, yel-ow, yelu, yeoluh, yelwe, a. & s. [A.S. geolu, geolu (fem. geoluw) = yellow; cogn. with Dut. geel; O. H. Ger. gelo, kelo; Ger. gelb, allied to Gr. χλωρόν (chlōzōn) = the young verdure of trees; Lat. helvius = light yellow, and from the same root as green, gall, and gold.]
A. As adj.: Being of a pure, bright, golden colour, or of a kindred hue; having the colour of that part of the solar spectrum between orange and green.
 "An apple also which first is green waxeth not soderly yelowe, but first it is somewhat white betwixt greue and yelowe indifferēt."—Fisher: A Godlie Treatise, &c.
¶ (1) Used as betokening jealousy, envy, melancholy, &c.; jaundiced, a usage derived from the figurative ideas connected with jaundice, the akin in jaundice being of yellow hue.
 "With a green and yellow melancholy." Shakspeare: Twelfth Night, II. 4.
¶ (2) Used as denoting age or decay.

¶ (3) Used to denote lack of skill, energy, or judgment, spec. in games, as a yellow play, a yellow decision (of an umpire), &c.; in a general way meaning inefficiency, carelessness, decadence.
B. As substantive:
 1. Art., &c.: One of the three primary colours; a bright golden colour, the type of which may be found in the field buttercup, which is a pure yellow. Mixed with blue, yellow yields green, and with red it produces orange. All our yellow pigments are alloyed with blue or red. Gamboge is a tolerably pure yellow pigment, but is tinged with blue; then comes gold ochre tinged with red; next, yellow ochre and Naples yellow. The other yellow pigments are chrome yellow, lemon yellow, Indian yellow, gall-stone, Roman ochre, Mars yellow, terra di Siena (raw and burnt), Indian pink, cadmium yellow, &c. The principal yellow dyes are obtained from arnott, justic, French berries, quercitron bark, turmeric, saw-wort, weld and willow leaves; also from chromate of lead, iron oxide, nitric acid, sulphide of antimony, and sulphide of arsenic. In blazonry, gold is the symbol of love, constancy, and wisdom; and, by opposition, yellow in our days still denotes inconstancy, jealousy, and adultery. In France the doors of traitors were daubed with yellow; and in some countries the law formerly ordained that Jews should be clothed in yellow because they had betrayed our Lord. Judas is represented clothed in yellow. In China, yellow is the symbol of faith.
 2. Bot.: A genus of colours of which the typical species, called simply yellow (in Latin luteus, in words of Greek composition xanthos), is of a gamboge hue. The other species are lemon-coloured, golden-yellow, pale-yellow, sulphur-coloured, straw-coloured, leather-yellow, ochre-colour, waxy-yellow, yolk-of-egg, apricot-colour, orange-colour, saffron-coloured, isabella-colour, testaceous-tawny, and livid. (Lindley: Introd. to Botany (3rd ed.), pp. 478-479.)
¶ (1) Bot.: Yellow Bachelor's Buttons is a double-flowered variety of Ranunculus acris cultivated in gardens. Yellow Bird's Nest = the genus Monotropa (q.v.), spec. M. Hypopitys; named in distinction from the Wild Carrot, also called Bird's Nest. (Prior.) Yellow Dead Nettle = Galeobdolon luteum. Yellow Sanders Wood = Pterocarpus flavus. Yellow Water Lily = Nuphar lutea.
(2) Min.: Yellow arsenate of nickel = Xanthosite; yellow copperas = Copiapite; Yellow copper ore = Copper pyrites; Yellow lead-spar = Wulfenite; Yellow ore = Wulfenite.
(3) Pathol.: Yellow Atrophy of the Liver is a disease called also Acute Atrophy, Wasting or Softening of the Liver, Diffused Hepatitis, or Fatal Jaundice. [For Yellow Softening of the Brain, see SORTAINING, ¶ (3).]

yellow-billed woodpecker, s.

Ornith.: Sphyrapicus varius, distributed over the United States.

yellow-bird, s.

Ornithology:

1. Chrysomitris tristis, the American Goldfinch, or Thistle-bird, generally distributed over North America. Length about five inches; male bright gamboge-yellow, with black crown, wings, and tail; band across wings, inner margin of tail feathers, and tail coverts white; female of duller plumage.

2. Dendroica aestiva, common throughout the United States. Length about five inches; head and lower parts bright yellow, rest of upper parts olive-yellow; back, breast, and sides streaked with brownish-red; two yellow bands on wings. Called also the Yellow-Poll Warbler and Summer Yellow Bird. The Cow-bird often deposits one of its parasitic eggs in the nest of the Summer Yellow Bird, which being unable to eject the large strange egg, pecks a hole in it and huries it at the bottom of the nest. If by chance the Cow-bird visits the same nest a second time, the egg is again buried, and thus are formed the three-storied nests occasionally found by egg-hunters. (Ripley & Dana.) yellow-blossomed, s. Bearing or having yellow blossoms.

yellow-boy, s. A gold coin, especially a guinea or a sovereign. (Slang.)

"John did not starve the cause: there wanted not yellow-boys to see counsel."—Arbutnot: John Bull.

yellow-deal, s.

Timber-trade: The timber of Pinus sylvestris.

yellow-earth, s.

Comm.: A yellowish clay coloured by iron, sometimes used as a pigment. (Goodrich.)

yellow-fever, s.

Pathol.: A malignant fever, varying considerably in character in different cases, but nearly always marked by the yellowness of the skin, which gives it its name, and, at an advanced stage, by the vomiting of dark coloured matter, whence it is often termed black vomit. It is a disease of hot countries, not rising high up mountain slopes, but breaking out in low and moist places, generally on the coast or when the temperature for a few weeks previous has been 72° Fahr., or more. The southern parts of North, and the tropical parts of South America, the West India, the Bermudas, the south of Spain, Portugal, the hotter parts of Africa, &c., are the places or regions which it has chiefly ravaged. Negroes, and even mulattoes, are however, almost wholly exempt from its attacks. In tropical seas or harbours, it has often broken out on shipboard, evil-smelling bilge-water having been the most potent factor in its production. Formerly it was believed to be contagious, now the contrary opinion is established on irresistible evidence. It is not communicated by contact with individuals, but people may take it by entry into the infected areas. It is a bilious fever, normally of the remittent type, though the remissions are often so slight and brief as to make it look like a continued fever, while sometimes, as it is departing, it passes into an intermittent. Its approach is generally foreshadowed by lassitude, loss of appetite, slight headache, and mental depression; the attack then commences, and, as in the case of cholera, generally in the night. The first, or cold stage, is marked by a feeling of chilliness, the patient, in certain very bad cases, succumbing at once. Generally, however, reaction takes place into the hot stage, the pulse rising, and the heat of the body increasing to 105° or 107°. There is acute headache, especially over one orbit; the conjunctiva is injected, the tongue pasty, the eyes become abnormally brilliant, the tongue pasty, with the edges and the apex red, the bowels intensely painful [RACURALGIA], great irritability of the stomach arises, with constipation, diminution in the quantity of urine, and pain in the calvea of the legs and in the knees. The patient cannot rest, but tosses his arms and his head about. The fever continues from three to seven or even nine days, a remission taking place at the end of the second or third day. Convalescence follows in favorable cases; in others the pulse becomes irregular, feeble, and slow; there is stupor of the brain, difficult breathing, and a vomiting of dark grumous blood, blood also coming from the gums, the nostrils, and other parts of the body. Then follow coma, convulsions, and death. The average mortality is about one in three of those attacked. Little can be done for a patient in yellow fever except to remove him from the infected area and give him very light, nourishing food and good nursing. When the disease becomes epidemic in a region, sanitation is the proper method of arresting its progress. Relapsing fever (q.v.) is sometimes called Mild Yellow-fever.

Hist.: This disease appears to be of American origin, there being no evidence to show that it was known in Europe before the voyage of Columbus, while there are historical indications of its presence in San Domingo in 1493, in Porto Rico in 1508, and in other localities at various succeeding periods. It was first recognized in the West India Islands shortly after the coming of the whites, and it has ever since radiated from this region in the lines of commercial intercourse, extending to all the Atlantic coast-cities of the United States, and to parts of Europe, its greatest ravages there having been in Spain. Its first appearance in the United States region was in 1693, when it visited Charleston, while Philadelphia was visited in the same year. In the succeeding period there were numerous appearances of yellow fever in the cities of this country, the severest outbreaks in the Atlantic coast cities being at New York in 1791, and at Philadelphia in 1762 and 1793, in which latter year the citizens died in such numbers that it was impossible to give them proper attention, and almost to bury them. A yellow fever hospital was established on Bush Hill, in which Stephen Girard, the celebrated philanthropist, cared for the sick with an attention and assiduity in which few of the citizens emulated him. Dr. Rush was equally assiduous in his attendance upon the sick, and employed blood-letting in his treatment with much success. This is no longer employed, but vigorous measures at the outbreak of the epidemics are still advocated. There have been epidemics in some of the northern cities within the present century, but none north of Norfolk since 1822, in which year strict quarantine was established in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and also in Spain, with the result of putting an end to epidemics in Europe, with the exception of Gibraltar in 1828. The more careful sanitation of recent years has also had to do with its disappearance. Yellow fever is never absent from some of the tropical cities. It has been persistent at Havana since 1761, at Rio de Janeiro since 1849, &c., the sufferers being largely among the strangers who visit these cities in the summer season. Where strict measures of sanitation are exercised, however, it is not likely to become again a scourge.

yellow-fibres, s. pl.

yellow-hammer, †yellow-ammer, yellow-bunting, s.

1. Ordinary Language:

Ornith.: Emberiza citrinella, one of the commonest British birds, widely distributed over Europe. Length about seven inches; general colour bright, with patches of dark brown, richly mottled brownish-yellow on back, with a warm ruddy tinge; primaries black edged with yellow; chin, throat, and under part of body bright pure yellow turning to dusky-brown on the flanks; tail slightly forked, and shorter than in the Common Bunting. The female is similarly marked, but less bright in hue. The Yellow-hammer frequents hedges and low trees; it nests on the ground, and the male assists in incubation. The song consists of few notes, but is sweet and pleasing.

"In former Editions of this work the author strove to restore what he believed to have been the first English name of this bird—Yellow Ammer. As might be expected in such a case, custom, whether right or wrong, would not give way to the proposed amendment and Yellow Hammer, with its abbreviation Yellow Ham, has been commonly printed from the days of Turner (1644) and Merrett (1667) to the present. There can indeed be no question of 'Hammer' (in this sense) being strictly cognate with the German Ammer, which survives in Zimmering (q.v. [Yellow-hammer]), was equally with Ammer a 'zoologic form.'—Farrall: British Birds (ed. 4th), ii. 48. (Note.)

* 2 Fig.: A gold coin; a yellow-hoy (Slang.)

"Is that he that hath gold enough! Would I had some of his yellow hammers!"—Shirley: Bird in a Cage.

2. A force of volunteer cavalry first embodied in Britain during the wars of the French Revolution, and consisting to a great extent of country gentlemen and farmers. They are liable to be called out in aid of the civil power in case of riot at any time; in case of actual invasion, or the appearance of an enemy on the coast, or during a rebellion, they may be assembled for active service; they are then subject to the Mutiny Act and Articles of War, and may be called upon to serve in any part of Great Britain. During permanent service they receive cavalry pay and an allowance for forage. They undergo six days' training, and must attend a certain number of drills yearly, for which they receive 7s. a day as subsistence allowance, and 2s. for forage. Arms and ammunition are provided by the War Office, and there is an annual allowance of £2 per man; but each man has to provide his own horse, which is exempt from taxation.

or less falcate coriaceous shining above, paler below, arranged in two ranks. Male catkins yellow, about a quarter of an inch long; females minute; fruit a red mucilaginous drupe or berry with green seed. It is indigenous in most parts of Continental Europe and in the Himalayas 6,000 to 10,000 feet above the sea-level, being in the last-named regions a much loftier tree than in England. The sap-wood of the yew is white, the heart-wood red, hard, close-grained, and susceptible of a fine polish. It weighs fifty-nine pounds to the cubic foot. It is prized in Europe by cabinet makers, and was formerly much used in England, as it still is in the Himalayas, for bow-making, being very tough. In some parts of the Khasia hills in Nepal the yew is deemed sacred, and its wood is burnt as incense. In Tibet a viscous exudation from it, mixed with other gums, is similarly employed. A red dye is made from the tree in the Bhutia country. Bentley and Trimen state that the leaves and young branches in all circumstances act as a narcotico-acrid poison on human beings, horses, and cows; that the seed of the fruit is poisonous, but that the pulp surrounding it is not so. The bark is used in Kunawar as a substitute for tea, or is mixed with tea-leaves. The yew is not used medicinally in England. In India its leaves and fruit, which somewhat resemble digitalis in their effects, have been employed as a lithic in calculus, and as an antispasmodic in epilepsy and convulsions. There is an advantage in yew over digitalis—that the former does not accumulate in the system like the latter. The yew of the United States and Canada (T. canadensis) is a much humbler tree than the species above described, which is occasionally of great size, an example being formerly shown of 56 feet in circumference. The Japan Yew is of another genus, Pedocarpus. P. ussifera is a lofty tree of northern Japan and Nepal, whose seed yields a culinary oil. There are other species of Pedocarpus in Asia, Australia, Chili, &c.

yō-dēl-ist, s. [Eng. yodel, v.; -ist.] One who yodels. (See extract under YODEL, s.)

Yō-ga, s. [Sans. = union, fitness, spiritual abstraction.]

Hindoo Philos.: One of the six Darśanas, i.e., schools or systems of Brahmanical Philosophy, that of Patanjali, the essence of which is meditation. It believes in a primordial soul which has had existence from an earlier period than primeval matter, and holds that from the two arose the spirit of life (Mshana-tma). Theoretically at least, its devotees can acquire even in this world entire command over elementary matter by certain ascetic practices, such as long continued suppression of the respiration, inhaling and exhaling the breath in a particular manner, sitting in eighty-four attitudes, fixing the eyes on the tip of the nose, and endeavouring, by the force of mental abstraction, to unite themselves with the vital spirit which pervades all nature and is identical with Siva. When this mystic union is effected, the Yogi can make himself lighter than the lightest, or heavier than the heaviest substance, or as small or as large as he pleases; he can traverse all space, can become invisible, can equally know the past, the present, and the future, and can animate any dead body by transferring to it his own spirit; finally he becomes united with Siva, and is exempt from the necessity of undergoing further transmigrations. [YOOI.]

yō-gī, yō-gin, s. [Sans., &c., from Yoga (q.v.).]

Brahmanism (Pl.): The Yogis are a Saivite sect, founded by Goraknath. They profess to be descendants of men who, by the practice of Yoga (q.v.), obtained power of effecting supernatural results. They go about India as fortune-tellers and conjurers. They have a temple at Gorakhpore, and traces of the order exist at Peshawar.

yō-ick, yō-icks, s. [From the sound made.] An old hunting cry.

yō-lok, v.t. [YOICK, s.] To cheer or urge on with a yoick.

"Hounds were barely yoicked into it at one side when a fox was tallied away."—Picad. Jan. 23, 1886.

yō-jan, s. [Sansc. yojana, from yuj = to join.] In Hindustan, a measure of distance varying in different places from four to ten miles, but generally reckoned as equivalent to five miles.

yōke, * yōcke, * yok, s. [A.S. geoc, gioc, ioc = a yoke; cogn. with Dut. juk; Icel. ok; Dan. aag; Sw. ok; Goth. juk; O. H. Ger. jōh; Ger. joch; Wel. ian; Lat. jugum; (whence Ital. giogo; Sp. yogo; Fr. joig); Russ. igo; Lith. jungas; Gr. ζυγόν (zygon); Sansc. yuga = a yoke, pair, couple; from the same root as Lat. jungo = to join; Gr. ζεύγνυμι (zeugnumi) = Eng. join (q.v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) A bar which connects two of a kind, usually; as, the ox-yoke, fastened by bows on the necks of a pair of oxen, or by thongs to the horns or foreheads of the oxen in some countries. An old contrivance by which pairs of draught animals, especially oxen, were fastened together. It generally consists of a piece of timber hollowed or made curving near each end, and fitted with bows for receiving the necks of the oxen, by which means two are connected for drawing. From a ring or hook in the bow a chain extends to the thing to be drawn, or to the yoke of another pair of oxen behind.

"A red heifer on which never came yoke."—Numb. xix. 2.

(2) Hence applied to anything resembling a yoke: as—

(a) The neck-yoke, by which the fore end of the tongue is suspended from the hames or collars of a span of horses.

(b) A frame to fit the shoulders and neck of a person, and support a couple of buckets suspended from the ends of the yoke.

(2) Young Men's Christian Association: Societies: An Association, inaugurated in London, June 6, 1844, the founder being Mr. George Williams. It had for its original object the holding of religious meetings in houses of business in the centre of London. Many similar associations springing up and becoming affiliated together, a General Conference of Delegates from the Associations of Europe and America was held in Paris in August, 1855, and the following Basis of Alliance was agreed to:—

"The Young Men's Christian Associations seek to unite those young men who, regarding the Lord Jesus Christ as their God and Saviour, according to the Holy Scriptures, desire to be His disciples in their doctrine and in their life, and to associate their efforts for the extension of His kingdom among young men."

No antagonism is intended towards the churches; on the contrary, these associations consider it alike their privilege and their duty to lead young men into the fellowship of the Churches, and under the influence of the Christian ministry.

This Association soon made its way to the United States, and in 1851 branches were established in New York, Philadelphia, and Boston. It has since progressed greatly in this country, and possesses large and fine buildings in Philadelphia, New York, Brooklyn, &c., in which are gymnasiums, libraries, reading and lecture rooms, and every requisite to make them centres of Christian influence. There was said to be, in 1888, 3,785 associations in existence, with 267,052 members. Of these, 1,240 associations, with 152,721 members, were in the United States; 605 associations, with 51,618 members, in Great Britain and Ireland; and 673 associations, with 35,752 members, in Germany. ýt-tri-a, s. [YTTRIUM.] Chem.: [YTTRIUM-OXIDE.]

ýt-tri-ös, a. [YTTRIUM.] Of or pertaining to yttria; containing yttria.

ýt-tri-üm, s. [Latinised from Ytterby, a town in Sweden. Chem.: A dyad earth-metal, symbol Y, atomic weight 61.7, existing together with erbium, as a silicate in gadolinite. It is obtained in the metallic state by digesting the mineral with hydrochloric acid, precipitating with oxalic acid, dissolving the oxalates formed in nitric acid, and separating by a series of fractional crystallizations; the erbium salt, being the less soluble of the two, crystallizing out first. On converting the nitrate into a chloride, and igniting with potassium, the metal is obtained as a blackish-gray powder, consisting of small, metallic, lustrous scales. It unites directly, at high temperatures, with chlorine, oxygen, and sulphur, and probably with other metalloids. The mineral Gadolinite is largely silicate of Yttria, and contains about 40 per cent. of the oxide of Yttrium. It has been found in large quantities in Texas, and more sparingly in Sweden and Norway. The oxide, Y2O3, is a yellowish-white powder.

yttrium-carbonate, s. [TENOEBITE.] yttrium-garnet, s. Min.: A variety of garnet occurring in Norway, containing, according to Bergemann, sometimes as much as 6.66 per cent. of yttria.

yttrium-oxide, s. Chem.: YO. Yttria. A soft white powder, obtained by igniting the oxalate. When boiled in hydrochloric, nitric, or sulphuric acids, it dissolves slowly but completely, forming colourless salts, and, when ignited, it glows with a pure white light.

yttrium-phosphate, s. [XENOTIME.] ýt-trö-, pref. [YTTRIUM.] Containing or resembling yttrium (q.v.).

ýt-trö-cäl-çite, s. [Pref. ýtro-, and Eng. calcite.] Min.: The same as YTTRICERITE (q.v.).

ýt-trö-çer-ite, s. [Pref. ýtro- and Eng. cerite.] Min.: A mineral occurring, associated with albite and topaz, at various places near Fahlun, Sweden; lately found at a few localities in the United States. Hardness, 4 to 5; sp. gr. 3.447; lustre, vitreous to pearly; colour, violet-blue shading to white. Compos.: variable, consisting of the fluorides of calcium, cerium, and yttrium.

ýt-trö-cö-lüm'-bite, s. [Pref. ýtro-, and Eng. columbite.] Min.: The same as YTTRITANTALITE (q.v.).

ýt-trö-güm'-mite, s. [Pref. ýtro-, and Eng. gummitite.] Min.: A mineral found associated with cleveite (of which it is probably a decomposition product), near Arendal, Norway. Hardness, 5.0; lustre, brilliant; colour, black to yellow; translucent; fracture, conchoidal. Compos.: a hydrated oxide of yttrium and uranium.

ýt-trö-íl'-mën-ite, s. [Pref. ýtro- and Eng. ilmenite.] Mineralogy:

1. A variety of yttriantalite in which Hermann supposed he had found a new element, his ilmenium.

2. The same as SAMARSKITE (q.v.).

yt-trô-tân-tâ-lite, s. [Pref. yttr-, and Eng. tantalite.]

Mfn.: An orthorhombic mineral occurring, in crystals and massive, in felspar and quartz, at Ytterby and Fahln, Sweden. Hardness, 5 to 5.5; sp. gr. 5.4 to 5.9; lustr., vitreous to greasy; colour, black, brown, shades of yellow; opaque to translucent; fracture, conchoidal. Compos.: a tantalate of yttria and lime, with sometimes iron and protoxide of arsenium, a mean of several analyses yielding: tantalate acid, 62.5; yttria, 22.6; lime, 5.2; protoxide of iron, 3.4; protoxide of uranium, 8.3 = 100, which corresponds to the formula 10(YO, FeO, CaO, UO)8TaO5.

yt-trô-ti-tan-ite, s. [Pref. yttr-, and Eng. titanite.]

Mfn.: The same as KEILHAUITE (q.v.).

yü, s. [See def.] The Chinese name for nephrite or jade (q.v.).

yü'-câ, s. [The Peruvian name of one species of the genus.]

Bot.: Adam's Needle; a liliaceous genus doubtfully placed under Tulipea. Evergreen shrubs, their stem tending to arborescence, crowned by a circle of linear, lanceolate, rigid leaves, from the centre of which rises a large panicle of snow-white, whitish-green, or cream-coloured flowers. Perianth bell-shaped, its segments without nectaries; stamens clavate, style wanting, fruit capsular, hexagonal, with three cellia and numerous flat seeds. From the hotter parts of America. Yucca gloriosa, Common Adam's Needle, has an upright stem, a panicle of flowers three feet long, and a total height in America of ten or twelve feet, though the cultivated plant is usually very much smaller. It is a native of the United States from Virginia to Mexico and Texas. Its fruit is purgative; its stem yields starch and also a fibre well adapted for paper-making. Y. angustifolia and Y. filamentosa have also fibres which may be similarly used. The last-named species, called the Silk grass, has panicles of pendulous cream-colored flowers. Y. alifera or vaccaea, the Spanish Bayonet, or Mexican Banana, bears an edible fruit.

YUCCA GLORIOSA AND FLOWER.

yüok, v.t. [Dut. jucken, joken; Low Ger. jöken; Ger. jucken = to itch.] To itch. (Prov.)

yüek, s. [YUCK, v.] The itch, or scabies. (Prov.)

yü'-ên, s. [WOOVEN.]

yüfts, s. [Rus. yüft.] A kind of Russian leather, which, when well prepared, is of a good red colour, soft and pliable on the surface and pleasant to the touch, with an agreeable, peculiar odour. (Simmonds.)

yü'-ga, yüo'-gâ, s. [Sansc. yûga, from yüj = to join.]

Hindoo Chron.: One of the periods into which the past history of the globe may be divided. There are four yugas: the Satya Yuga, containing 1,728,000 years; the Treta Yuga, 1,296,000; the Dwapara Yuga, 864,000 years; and the Kali Yuga, now in progress, began about a.c. 3094, and which will extend to 432,000 years. Horace Hayman Wilson points out that these numbers originate in the descending arithmetical progressions of 4, 3, 2, 1, according to the utimna of diminishing virtue in the several ages applied to a cycle of 12,000 divine years, each equal to 360 years of mortals; and 12,000 x 360 is = 4,320,000, the periods of the four yugas added together. (Mill: Hist. of Brit. India (ed. 4th), i. 155-157).

yü'-lan, s. [Chinese (Y.)]

Bot.: Magnolia conspicua (= M. Yulan), a tree, a native of China, where it is forty or fifty feet high, though in England but twenty or twenty-five. It has large, brilliant snow-white flowers, shining forth from gray and naked branches early in spring before the leaves appear.

yüle, *yole, s. [A.S. yula, gedia; geol. gehhol, gehhel; cogn. with Icel. jöl; Dan. juul; Sw. jul. A word of doubtful origin. Skeat prefers the solution given by Fick, viz., that yule = noise or outcry, and especially the loud sound of revelry and rejoicing; cf. Mid. Eng. goulen, gollen = to lament loudly; Eng. yawl (v.); A.S. gýlan = to make merry, to keep festival; Icel. yla = to howl, make a noise; Ger. jolen, johlen, jodeln = to sing in a high-pitched voice. From this word comes (through the French) jolly (q.v.).] The old English, and still, to some extent, the Scotch and Northern name for Christmas, or the Feast of the Nativity of Our Lord.

"Sitting at their banquet on the twelfth day in Christmas, otherwise called yule." - Holmshed: Hist. Scotland (an. 1219).

yule-block, s. A yule-log (q.v.).

yule-log, s. A large log of wood, often a tree-root, forming the basis of a Christmas fire in the olden time.

yule-tide, s. The season or time of Christmas; Christmas.

† yü'-ün'-gî-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. yunx, genit. yung(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: A family of Picarian Birds, with one genus, Iunx or Yunx (q.v.).

yü'-ünx, y-ünx, s. [Lat. iynx, tunx, from Gr. iynx (tunga) = the wryneck (q.v.).]

Ornith.: A genus of Picidae (sometimes raised to the rank of a family, Yungidae), with five species, characteristic of the Palearctic region, but extending into North and East Africa, over the greater part of India (but not to Ceylon), and just reaching the lower ranges of the Himalayas. There is also one species isolated in South Africa. Beak shorter than head, hard, straight, nearly conical, sharp at tip; nostrils basal, linear, closed by a membrane; tongue protrusile, with smooth, horny tip; wings moderate, tail somewhat rounded; tarsi strong, slightly feathered in front above; two toes before and two behind; claws much hooked, grooved, and very sharp. The name of the genus should properly be Iunx, but the misspelling of Linnæus (Syst. Nat., ed. 12th, i. 172) has been followed by the majority of authors, though now there is a tendency to revert to the correct spelling.

yü'-pôn, s. [YAPON.]

yürt, s. [Native name.] The name given to houses or tents, whether permanent or movable, used by the natives of Northern Asia or Siberia.

yüx, s. [YEX, YOXE.] A hiccough or hiccup.

yüx, v.t. [YUX, s.] To hiccough or hiccup.

*y-ve, s. [IVV.]

*y-vel, s. & adv. [EVLIL.]

*y-voire, s. [IVOAY.]

*y'-wis, adv. [A.S. gewiss, gewis = certain, sure; cogn. with Dut. gewis; Ger. gewiss = certainly.] [Wis.] Certainly, verily, truly.

*y-wrake, *y-wroke, pret. & pa. par. of v. [WREAK, v.]

*y-wrie, pa. par. [A.S. wriôn.] [WRIE.] Covered.

Z.

Z, the last letter of the English alphabet, is a sibilant consonant, and is merely a vocal or sonant s, having exactly the same sound as s in please, ease, wise, &c. The words in modern English which begin with z are all derived from other languages, principally from Greek. It was not known in the oldest English. When not initial, it frequently represents an older s, as dizzy = A.S. dysig, freeze = A.S. freosan, &c. It also stands for a French c or s, as in hazard, heard, buzzard, seize. Z has intruded into citizen = Fr. citoyen; and it has changed into g in ginger = Lat. zingiberi. As a final it occurs in some onomatopoeic words, as in buzz, whizz, &c. In some southern dialects, as Kentish and Somerset, it is commonly used for s. In German it is very common, being a double consonant with the sound of ts; and similarly in Greek it was also a double consonant, representing the sounds ds or ed. In Britain it is called zed; in America, zed, or zec.

*za, s. [From the sound.]

Music: The seventh harmonic, as heard in the horn or Æolian string. It corresponds to a flat.

zâ'-ba'-îsm, zâ'-bîsm, s. [SABIANISM.]

zâ'-bî-ân, a. & s. [SABIAN.]

zâ'-brûs, s. [Gr. ζαβρός (zabros) = voracious. (Agassiz.)]

Entom.: A genus of Carabideæ, sub-family Pterostichine. Zabrus gibbus is a broadly oblong beetle of dark-bronze hue, found occasionally in England, but abundant in parts of the continent.

zâ-bu-câ'-jô, a. [Native name.]

zabucajo-nuts, s. pl.

Bot., &c. (Pl.): The fruit of Lecythis Zabucajo, a South American plant. The nuts, two inches long and one broad, enclosed in urn-like fruits, are imported into England and eaten. [SAPORIFEROUS.]

Zâc'-chê-an, s. [See def.]

Church Hist. (Pl.): A local name for the Guostics, mentioned by Epiphanius, but without adding where they were so called. Probably from some leader named Zaccheus.

zâ-qin'-thâ, zâ-qyn'-thâ, a. [Lat. Zacinthus = Zante, the island in which the genus was first found.]

Bot.: A genus of Lactuceæ, with only one known species, Zacintha verrucosa, an annual, with divided leaves; an involucre, becoming fleshy; the inner scales folded, the outer membranous; pappus hairy; achenes flattened, wingless. The plant is used in the Mediterranean countries as a phagædic.

zâdd, s. [An Abyssinian name of the tree described.]

Bot.: Juniperus procera, one of the largest trees in Abyssinia, producing a hard and durable wood much employed in that country for building purposes.

zâf'-fre (re as ér), zâf'-far, zâf'-fir, zâph'-a-ra, s. [The word is probably of Arabic origin; Fr. & sp. zafre; Ger. zaffer.]

Chem.: An impure basic arsenate of cobalt, prepared by roasting speiss-cobalt. It is employed in painting on glass and porcelain, for which purpose it must be free from iron. [COBALT.]

zâ-îm, s. [TURK.] A Turkish chief or leader.

zâ'-î-mêt, s. [TURK.] An estate; a district from which a zaim draws his revenue.

zâ'-lâ, s. [BORAX.]

zâ-lâo'-câ, s. [Latinised from its Javanese name salzak.]

Bot.: A genus of Pinnated Calameæ. Stemless palms with spines on the sheathing petioles; dioecious flowers, with many spatheæ; the males in pairs, and the female solitary, both surrounded by bracts; fruit armed with overlapping scales, with two or three seeds encased in a fleshy covering. Species, six or seven, natives of Burmah, Assam, Malacca, &c., where they grow in moist places in dense masses, constituting nearly impenetrable thickets. The pulpy covering of the seeds is eaten by the Burmese, and the plant, in consequence, is sometimes cultivated.

† zâ'-ô-phûs, s. [Gr. ζα- (za-), intensive, and λóφος (lophos) = a crest.]

Zool.: A genus of Otariidæ, with two species, from the North Pacific and the shores of Australia and New Zealand. Separated from Otaria (q.v.) by some authors on account of the great skull-crest.

bôll, bôy; pôut, jôwî; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -îng. -clan, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün. -tion, -sion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bël, dël.

zā-māng', s. [Native name.]

Bot.: Pithecolobium Saman, an immense tree, with a top some hundred feet in circumference, growing in Venezuela.

zām-bō', s. [Sp. = bandy-legged . . . a zambo.] The child of a mulatto and a negro. Also sometimes of an Indian and a negro. Also written Sambo.

Zām-bō'-nī, s. [Giuseppe Zamboni, an Italian physician and medical author (1776-1840), who, in conjunction with De Linc, invented the pile which bears the name of the former.] (See compound.)

Zamboni's pile, s.

Elect.: A dry voltaic pile or battery invented by Zamboni. Paper silvered on one side is damped and coated on the other with manganese dioxide; half a dozen of these sheets being superposed to save time, discs are punched out, and 1,000 to 2,000 single sheets are compressed in a glass tube with metal caps and knobs at the ends. Such a pile retains its activity for years, and will charge a Leyden jar, though it will not give shocks or sparks.

zā-mī-a, s. [Lat. = a pine cone, which, when suffered to decay upon the tree, injured the succeeding crop (Pliny), hence applied by Linnæus to this genus, in allusion to the sterile appearance of the male fructification; Gr. ζῆνία (zēmia) = loss, damage.]

Bot.: A genus of Cycadaceæ. Trees of moderate size, with trunk, the woody tissue of which has its tubes marked by circular discs. The stem is terminated above by a single bud, which ultimately opens into a circle of leaves, usually thick, and planatifid with spiny margins. The venation is gyrate. The flowers, which are dioecious, are in tessellated catkins; the males having abrupt scales, with the oval anthers sessile beneath them; the females with petalate scales, each with two seeds. The fruit is drupaceous. In aspect the species partly resemble palms, and partly tree-ferns; in affinity they are nearer the latter than the former, but rise considerably above them in organization. Natives of tropical America, tropical Asia, the Cape of Good Hope, and Australia. Zamia cæfra is the Bread-tree Zamia. It is six or seven feet high, and is a native of south-eastern Africa, where the Caffres and the Hottentots make cakes of the pith after it has putrefied. Z. spiralis has many smooth leaflets, with a few spines at the tip. It grows in Australia, where the natives eat the fruit. The stems of Z. tenuis and Z. furfuracea, and the seeds of Z. pumila, in the West India, yield arrowroot.

zām-in-dar', s. [ZEMINDAR.]

zā-mī-ōs-trō-būs, s. [Lat. zamia (q.v.), and Gr. στρόβος (strobos) = a top.]

Palæobot.: A genus of Cycadaceæ. One species occurs in the British Jurassic rocks, one in the Wealden, and there are two from the Upper Greensand. (Eliheridge.)

zā-mīte, s. [ZAMITES.]

Palæobot.: Any individual of the genus Zamites.

zā-mī-tōs, s. [Lat. zamia (q.v.); suff. -ites.]

Palæobot.: A genus of Cycadaceæ, akin to the recent Zamia. In Britain, from the Rhætic to the Lower Jurassic. (Eliheridge.) A species also exists in the Miocene flora of the Arctic regions.

zā-mōuse', s. [Native name.]

Zool.: Bos brachycerus, from the tropical parts of Western Africa, known at Sierra Leone as the Bush Cow. Colour pale chestnut, hair thin and nearly erect; forehead flatter than in other buffaloes; horns short, sharp, wide apart at base, extending outward and upward, then suddenly incurving; ears very large, with three rows of long hairs springing from the inside, and a tuft of long hairs at the tip; dewlap entirely absent.

zampogna (as dzam-pō-nyā), s. [Ital.]

Music:

- 1. The Italian bagpipes.
2. A rough-toned reed instrument shaped like a flageolet.

*zām-tite, s. [See def.]

Min.: A misprint for Zaratite (q.v.).

zān-clūs, s. [Gr. ζῶν (zōn) = a reaping-hook.]

1. Ichthy.: A genus of Carangidæ, from the Pacific Ocean. Body much compressed and elevated; one dorsal, with seven spines, the third of which is greatly elongated; no teeth on palate; scales minute, velvety. There is but one species, Zanclus cornutus, easily recognized by its long snout and by the broad bands crossing the yellow ground-colour. It is about eight inches long, and undergoes various changes in its development.

2. Palæont.: From the Eocene of Monte Bolca.

zand, s. [ZEND.]

zān-d-mōle, s. [Dot.] [SAND-MOLE.]

zān-nī-chēl-lī-a, s. [Named after John Jerome Zannichelli, a Venetian apothecary and botanist (1662-1729).]

Bot.: Horned Pond-weed, a genus of Naiadaceæ. Water-plants with submerged, linear leaves and minute flowers, generally monocious. Barren flowers, with the perianth wanting, and a solitary stamen with a two- to four-celled anther. Fertile flowers with a perianth of one leaf, four or more stamens, an elongated, undivided style, a petalate stigma, and nearly sessile achenes. Known species, one or more, from temperate and tropical climes. If only one species exists it is Zannichellia palustris, the Common Horned Pond-weed, which floats in ditches and stagnant waters.

zā-nō-nī-a, s. [Named after James Zanon, superintendent of the Botanical Garden at Bologna, and author of a work on plants published in 1673. He died in 1682.]

Bot.: A genus of Nandrobææ. Climbing plants with cordate leaves, their axils bearing tendrils with clusters of dioecious flowers. The males have a three-lobed calyx, a rotate corolla with the limb five parted, and five stamens with one-celled anthers. Female with three styles, and a three-celled ovary developing into a fleshy fruit. The leaves of Zanonina indica, beaten up with milk and butter, are applied as a liniment in antispasmodic affections. They are also used in baths in nervous diseases.

zān-tō, s. [See def.] A golden-yellow species of sumach from the island of Zante, in the Mediterranean, used for dyeing. Called also Young Fustic, and Fustet.

zante-wood, s.

- (1) Rhus Cotinus. [RHUS, FUSTIC (2).]
(2) Chloroxylon Suedenia. [CHLOROXYLON.]

zān-thōx'-y-lūm, s. [See def.]

† Bot.: Another spelling of Xanthoxylon (q.v.).

Zān-tī-ōte, Zān-tī-ōt, s. [See def.] A native of Zante, one of the Ionian Islands.

zā-nŷ, s. [O. Ital. Zane = John . . . a gull, a noddy, a clown, a fool or simple fellow in a play; Ital. Zanni = Gioranni = John. [JOHN, (1).] A subordinate buffoon, whose office was to make awkward attempts at mimicking the tricks of the professional clown; hence, a buffoon in general, a merry-andrew.

"Approbation which those very people give, equally with me, to the zany of a mountebank."—Dryden: Evening's Love. (Pref.)

*zā-nŷ, v.t. [ZANY, a.] To play the zany; to mimic.

"All excellence In other madams do but envy hers."

Beaumont & Fletcher: Queen of Corinth, l. 2.

*zā-nŷ-ism, s. [Eng. zany, s.; -ism.] The state, character, or practices of a zany; buffoonery.

"The caricature of his filth and zanyism proves how fully he both knew and felt the danger."—S. T. Coleridge: A Course of Lectures, ix.

Zān-zā-lī-anŷ, s. pl. [For etym. & def. see extract.] [JACOBITE, A. 2. (1).]

"Paradeus was also surnamed Zanulus, and hence the Jacobites have been sometimes called Zanulians."—Blunt: Dict. Sects, p. 234.

zāph'-a-ṛa, s. [ZAFFRE.]

zāph-rēn-tī-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zaphrentis; fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Palæont.: A sub-family of Cyathophyllidæ. Corallum simple and free, conical, discoidal or cylindrical; tabulæ complete; dissepiments few; septa rendered irregular by the presence of a septal fossula. [Ety. not apparent.]

Palæont.: The typical genus of Zaphrentinæ (q.v.). Corallum turbinate; tabulæ quite across the visceral chamber; a well-marked fossula present; septa extending to near the centre of the coral. One species in the Upper Silurian, and eight in the Carboniferous Limestone series. (Eliheridge.)

zā-pōd'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zapus, genit. zapod(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: According to Coenæ a family or Mouse-like Rodents, consisting of the genus Zapus, with a single species, Zapus Hudsonius. [JACULUS, MERIONES.]

zāp-ō-dī-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zapus, genit. zapod(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Zool.: A sub-family of Dipodidæ, of the same extent as Zapodidæ (q.v.), another sub-family, Dipodinæ, containing the true Jerboas.

zāp-ō-tīl-lā, s. [SAPOTILLA.]

zāp-tī-ēh, s. [Turk.] A Turkish policeman. "Of all the Turkish officials the worst are the Zap-tihs, or policemen, who oppress with the most perfect impartiality both Turks and Bulgarians."—Times, Nov. 1, 1887.

zāp-ūs, s. [Gr. ζα (za), intensive, and ποῦς (pous) = a foot.]

Zool.: The type-genus of Zapodidæ (q.v.). [JACULUS, MERIONES.]

Zar-a-thūs'-trīc, Zar-a-thūs'-trī-an, a. [For etym. see def. and extract.] Of or belonging to Zarathustra, more often corrupted into Zoroaster. [ZOROASTRIAN.]

"It cannot be denied that the Zarathustrian dogmas are pure old Aryan myths in a new shape. . . but he was doubtless a reformer, or, if Zarathustra was no historical person, a body of reformers who called the Zarathustrian religion into existence."—Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th), xx. 361.

Zar-a-thūs'-trīsm, s. [ZARATHUSTRIAN.]

Compar. Relig.: Zoroastrianism (q.v.).

"Through the great Aryan religious systems, Brahmanism, Zarathustrianism, Buddhism, and onward into the range of Islam and of Christianity, subterranean links of purgatory or punishment make doleful contrasts to heavens of light and glory."—Tyler: Prim. Cult. (1873), ii. 68.

zā-ra-tīte, s. [After Señor Zarate, of Spain; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring as an encrustation on magnetite and chromite. Hardness, 3 to 3.25; sp. gr. 2.57 to 2.693; lustre vitreous; colour, emerald green; transparent to translucent. Compos.: carbonic acid, 11.7; oxide of nickel, 59.4; water, 28.9 = 100, which is equivalent to the formula NiOCO2 + 2NiOHO + 4H2O.

zā-reō-bā, s. [ZERIBA.]

Zāu-rāc, s. [Corrupted Arabic.]

Astron.: A fixed star, between the second and third magnitude. Called also γ Eridani.

zāwn, s. [Cf. Yane.]

Mining: A cavern.

zāx, s. [A.S. seax; Icel. sax = a knife or short sword; O. H. Ger. saks.] A slater's hatchet, with a sharp point on the pole, for perforating the slate to receive the pin. The zax is about sixteen inches long and two in width; it is somewhat bent at one end, and the spur is three inches long.

zā-yāt, s. [Native name.] In Burmah a public shed or portico for the accommodation of travellers, loungers, and worshippers, found in every Burmese village, and attached to many pagodas. (H. Yule.)

z' crānk, s. [From its zigzag form.]

Mach.: A peculiarly shaped crank in the cylinder of some marine steam-engines. (Simmonds.)

zō-a, s. [Lat., from Gr. ζῆα (zea), ζεῖα (zeia) = spelt or some other common cereal. The name occurs in Homer.]

Bot.: Maize; a genus of Phalarææ. Flowers monocious; males in terminal racemes, having two-flowered spikelets, and nearly equal sharp-pointed glumes; pales two, fleshy; females axillary in the sheaths of the leaves. Species five: Zea mays is the maize (q.v.); Z. Cuvruga.

"To certain zealants all speech of pacification is odious."—Bacon. (Tisd.)

* zēaled, a. [Eng. zeal; -ed.] Filled with zeal; characterized by zeal.

"You might have done, but for that sealed religion You woulesd beat to swooning." Bacon & Flet.: Love's Pilgrimage, iv. 2.

* zēal-fūll, * zēal-fūll, a. [Eng. zeal; -full.] Full of zeal; zealous, enthusiastic.

"In zealfull knowledge of the Truth divine." Sylvester: The Decay, 482.

* zēal-lēss, * zeale-lesse, a. [Eng. zeal; -less.] Destitute of zeal; wanting in zeal.

"We are not patient, but zealelesse."—Bp. Hall: Cont.; Μητροπολιτικῆς & Zebra.

zēal-ōt, s. [Fr. zélate = jealous, zealous, from Lat. zelotes.] [ZEAL, s.]

1. One who is zealous or full of zeal; one carried away by excess of zeal; a fanatical partisan. It is generally applied in dispraise or used of one whose zeal or ardour is intemperate or censurable; a fanatic.

"He was in truth not a man to be popular with the vindictive zealots."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng. ch. xiv.

2. One of a fanatical Jewish sect which struggled desperately against the Romans from about A.D. 6 till the fall of Jerusalem.

zēa-lōt-īo-al, * zē-lōt-īo-al, a. [Eng. zealot; -ial.] Ardently zealous.

"Dr. Marshall, dean of Christ Church, a most furious and zealous man."—Styrie: Life of Cranmer, ch. xix.

* zēal-ōt-īsm, s. [Eng. zealot; -ism.] The character or conduct of a zealot.

* zēal-ōt-īst, * zēl-ōt-īst, s. [Eng. zealot; -ist.] A zealot.

"I could wish these scilicet zealotists had more judgment joined with their zeal."—Howell: Letters.

* zēal-ōt-ry, s. [Eng. zealot; -ry.] The conduct or behaviour of a zealot; excessive or undue zeal; fanaticism.

"Inquisition cruelty and party zealotry."—Coleridge. (Walter.)

zēal-ōus, * zel-ous, a. [Eng. zeal; -ous.] [JEALOUS.]

1. Inspired with zeal; ardent in the pursuit of an object; enthusiastic.

"I love to see a man zealous in a good matter."—Addison: Spectator, No. 185.

* 2. Sometimes, though rarely, used in a bad sense.

"The zealous and facetious Presbyter, Novatus."—Gauden: Tears of the Church, p. 100.

1. In a zealous manner; with zeal, ardour, or enthusiasm.

"The Indians all offered very zealously to assist us against him."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. I, ch. xvi.

* 2. Religiously; with religious or pious zeal. (Milton.)

zēal'-ōus-nēs, s. [Eng. zealous; -ness.] The quality or state of being zealous; zeal, ardour, enthusiasm, fervour.

"The zealousness of our endeavours, and the applause that others entertain them with."—Boyle: Works, l. 296.

zē'-bēc, zē'-bēc, s. [XEBEC.]

zē'-brā, s. [The native name; according to Littré the word was originally Ethiopian.]

Zoology:

1. A popular name for any of the striped forms of the genus Equus; thus embracing the Quagga (q.v.), the True Zebra, and Burchell's Zebra. [2.] In all three the external characters are those of the Ass rather than of the Horse; the legs are without warts, the tail is furnished with long hairs only towards the extremity, the neck is full and arched, and the mane stiff and erect. All the species of this division are rapidly vanishing before advancing civilization, and in all probability will become extinct before very many years.

"This family [Equidae] comprises the Horses, Asses, and Zebras."—Nicholson: Zoology (ed. 1878), p. 668.

2. Equus zebra, from the mountainous regions of South Africa. It stands about four feet and a half at the shoulder; ground tint white, with black stripes, vertical on body and horizontal on legs; limbs slender, head light, ears long and open. The zebra lives in small herds in secluded spots; its sense of hearing, sight, and smell is extremely acute, and on the least alarm the whole herd scampers off. When compelled to defend themselves zebras form a compact body with their heads in the centre and their heels outwards, and have been known to beat off the leopard with their kicks. The zebra has been domesticated, but its vicious temper renders it of little value as a beast of burden. Burchell's Zebra (Equus burchellii) differs little from the True Zebra, except in the fact that the ground tint is yellow.

"He who attributes the white and dark vertical stripes on the flanks of various antelopes to this process (sexual selection) will probably extend the same view to the Royal Tiger and the beautiful zebra."—Darwin: Descent of Man, ch. xviii.

zebra-opossum, s. [ZEBRA-WOLF.]

zebra-plant, s.

Bot.: Calathea zebrina. So named because the leaves have alternately dark and green stripes.

zebra-poison, s.

Bot.: Euphorbia arborea, a South African tree.

zebra-shark, s. [TIGER-SHARK.]

zebra-wolf, † zebra-opossum, s.

Zool.: A popular name given by the early colonists of Van Diemen's Land to Thyacinus cynocephalus, from the stripes on its body and its general dog-like appearance. [THYLACINUS.]

zebra-wood, s.

Botany & Commerce:

1. A kind of wood, imported from South America, and used by cabinet makers, produced by Omphalobium Lambertii, a large tree belonging to the natural order Connaraceae, and growing in Guiana. Its colours consist of brown on a white ground, clouded with black, and each strongly contrasted, thus somewhat resembling the skin of a zebra. Called also Pigeon-wood.

2. The wood of Eugenia fragrans, variety cuneata. It is a shrub about eight feet high, growing in Jamaica.

3. The wood of Guettarda speciosa, a tree twenty-five feet high, with scarlet coloured flowers, growing in the East Indies.

zē'-brine, a. [Eng. zebra; suff. -ine.] Of or belonging to the striped division of the genus Equus (q.v.).

"Many of them [the stripes] as they diverged from the spine became a little branched, exactly in the same manner as in some zebra species."—Darwin: Variation of Anim. & Plants, l. 58.

zē'-bū, s. [Native name.]

Zool.: Any bred or individual of Bos indicus (which by some authorities is considered a variety of Bos taurus, the Common Ox). The Zebu attain their greatest development in India, but range eastwards to Japan and westward to the River Niger. They vary greatly in size, some being larger than European cattle, while others are no bigger than a month-old calf. The horns differ in form; the dewlap is more or less developed; one hump is always present over the withers, sometimes there are two; colour varying from light ash-gray to pure white. At present they exist only in a domesticated condition, and must have been early reduced to subjection by man, since all the sculptures of cattle at Elephanta, which are of high antiquity, represent the humped form. In many parts of India zebus are used as beasts of draught and burden, and occasionally for riding. In disposition they are gentle and docile, and are venerated by the Hindus, who consider it a sin to slaughter them, though they do not object to work them. White zebu bulls, which are held particularly sacred by the Hindus, are branded with the image of Siva, relieved from all labour, and allowed to wander at will, levying contributions on the stalls in the bazaars without let or hindrance. Their flesh is inferior to that of the Common Ox, except the hump, which is esteemed a delicacy.

ZEBU.

zebu-cattle, s.

Zool.: The humped cattle of the eastern hemisphere.

"In many domesticated quadrupeds, certain characters, apparently not derived through reversion from any wild parent-form, are confined to the males or are more developed in them than the females—for instance, the hump on the male zebu-cattle of India."—Darwin: Descent of Man, ch. xviii.

Zēh-ā-rī-ah, Zāh-ā-rī-as, s. [Heb. זְכַרְיָה (Zekhariyah) = Zechariah (whom Jehovah remembers); זָכַר (Zakhar) = to remember, and יָה (Yah) = Jehovah; Sept. Ζαχαρίας (Zacharias); Vulgate, Zacharius.]

1. Script. Biog.: The name of many ancient Hebrews, including two prophets [2], various priests, and Levites (1 Chron. ix. 21; xv. 24; xxvi. 14; Neh. xii. 35, 41), &c.

2. Old Testament Canon: The eleventh in order of the twelve minor prophetic books. The name prefixed to it is that of "Zechariah, the son of Berechiah, the son of Iddo the prophet" ("the prophet" means Zechariah, not Iddo), Zechariah i. l. In Ezra v. i, vi. 14, he is called the son of Iddo, but son is sometimes used vaguely for lineal male descendant, and may easily signify grandson (cf. Gen. xi. 24-32; xxviii. 5; xxix. 18). When Cyrus permitted the Jews to return from Babylon he also accorded them permission to rebuild the temple (Ezra i. 3; vi. 3-5), and the foundations of the edifice were at once laid (Ezra iii. 10-13). The jealousy of the neighbouring tribes led to the stoppage of the work (Ezra iv. 1-24). At length, however, in the second year of Darius Hystaspes, permission was obtained to resume it (Ezra iv. 24, vi. 1-12), and building was recommenced with the patronage and active aid of Zerubbabel, the civil governor of Judæa, Joshua the High Priest, &c. Enthusiasm for the work was excited among the previously apathetic people by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (Ezra v. 1-2). The former seems to have been the senior in point of years, and commenced his addresses and predictions in the sixth month of the second year of Darius, while Zechariah did so in the eighth month. The book of Zechariah, in its present form, is naturally divided into three portions—chaps. i.-viii., chaps. ix.-xi., and chaps. xii.-xiv. The first is universally admitted to be the work of Zechariah. The natural sections of it are (1) chap. i. 1-6, dated the second year of Darius's reign and the eighth month; (2) i. 7-vi. 15, dated the twenty-fourth day of the eleventh month of the same year; and vii. 1-viii. 23, dated the fourth day of the ninth month of Darius's fourth regnal year. In the first the prophet counsels a return to Jehovah; in the second, which has in it various symbolic visions, he encourages the building of the temple, and, in answer to a query whether the fasts begun at Babylon should be continued, he directs that they should be transformed into joyous festivals. The style of chapters ix.-xi. differs from that of the first eight; and that of xii.-xiv. to a certain extent from both. In x. 6, the house of Judah requires to be strengthened, as if its government still continued; that of Joseph (the ten tribes) to be saved, as if it were gone; and in verse 11 is the prediction "the pride of Assyria shall be brought down," as if it stood when the words were penned; whereas by the time of Darius Hystaspes it had for ever passed away. Some, therefore, assign these chapters to an earlier Zechariah, a contemporary of Isaiah (s.c. about 736). But if the Hebrew Javan in ix. 13 is correctly translated Greece, this would suggest a date late enough to be consistent with the best-known Zechariah's authorship, if not more recent still. Chaps. xii.-xiv. have been referred to some prophetic contemporary of Jeremiah, a.c. 607 or 606. The date of chaps. i.-viii. is admitted to be b.c. 520-518. Matt. xxvii. 9-10, nominally quoting Jeremiah, seems to refer to Zech. xi. 12-13, and unless Zechariah, the son of Berechiah, of whose death we know nothing, was martyred precisely in the same way as Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada (2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 21), the reference in Matt. xxiii. 35 would seem to be to the latter. Of these difficulties various solutions have been given. Zech. xii. 7 is quoted by Our Lord as Messianic (Matt. xxvii. 51, Mark xiv. 27). In Matt. xxi. 5, Zech. ix. 9 is regarded as predictive of the entry of Jesus into Jerusalem.

zēch'-in, s. [Ital. zechino; Fr. sequin.] A Venetian gold coin, more commonly written sequin (q.v.).

zēch'-stein, s. [Ger. = mine-stone: zeche = a reckoning, a score, and stein = stone.] Geol.: A German sub-division of the Permian, constituting the upper of the two groups, which have sometimes led to that formation being called Dyas (q.v.). It corresponds to the Middle Permian or Magnesian Limestone of Britain. It is wanting in France. Murchison considered it a centre of Permian life.

zēd, zēē, s. [Z.] The name of the letter z; provincially called also Izzard.
"Thou whoreson zed! thou unnecessary letter!"—Shakesp.: Lear, ii. 2.

zēd'-ō-a-r'y, s. [From Arab zedwār; Fr. zédouaire; Prov. zeduair; Port. zeduaria; Ital. zedouario.]
Bot. & Pharm.: The roots of Curcuma Zedoaria and C. Zerumbet, employed in medicine, and the plants themselves. [CURCUMA.]

zēd'-kōe, s. [Dut. = sea (or lake) cow.] The name given by the Dutch colonists of South Africa to the hippopotamus.

* zē'-ī-dae, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. ze(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.] Ichthy.: A lapsed family of Acanthopterygian Fishes.

zēi'-lan-ite, zēy'-lan-ite, s. [O. Ger. Zeylan, Zeylan = Ceylon; suff. -ite (Min.).]
Min.: The same as CEYLONITE (q.v.).

zē-in, s. [Mod. Lat. ze(a); -in.]
Chem.: A nitrogenous substance obtained from maize flour.

zēl, zēll, s. [Pera.]
Music: An eastern instrument of music of the cymbal kind.

"Where, some hours since, was heard the swell
Of trumpet and the clash of zell."
Moore: The Fire Worshipers.

zēl-kō-na, s. [Native name?] (See etym. and compend.)

zēl-kōna-tree, s.
Bot.: Planera Richardi, a North American tree, seventy or eighty feet high, the diameter of the trunk four feet. Leaves like those of the elm, flowers small greenish yellow, smelling like elder flowers; fruit small, with two seeds.

* zēl'-ōt-ist, s. [ZEALOTIST.]

* zēl'-ōū-sie, s. [Gr. ζελώω (zelōō) = to emulate, to be jealous of.] Jealousy.
"The zealous and the eager fierceness of Olimpias."
—Udā: Apoph. of Erasmus, p. 200.

zēm-in-dar, s. [Pers. zemīndār = a landholder, from zemīn = land, and dār = holding, a holder.] In India, one of a class of officials created under the Mogul Government of India. They have been regarded, first as district governors, secondly as lauded proprietors, and thirdly as farmers or collectors of the government revenue on land. Their functions appear to have been to a great extent arbitrary and variable, but founded on and arising out of the last-named office. On the transference of the authority of the Moguls to the East India Company, the zemindars were in general treated as the proprietors of land. The term is of Persian origin, and the office probably originated with the Muhammadan conquerors of India, who claimed the soil of the country, but, leaving the Indian village tenure intact, set these officers called zemindars over districts comprising each a certain number of villages, the headmen of which accounted to them for the revenues of the land, which they collected with a liberal profit to themselves. At present, in Bengal, the zemindars have all the rights of a British landed proprietor, subject to the payment of the land-tax, and also to a certain ill-defined tenant-right on the part of tenants who have long held possession of their farms.

"It was contemplated that these zemindars would take the place of the landed gentry of European countries, and become leaders in all kinds of agricultural reforms."—Field, Feb. 11, 1858.

zēm-in-dar-y, zēm-in-dar-eē, zēm-in-dar-r'y, &c. & s. [ZEMINDAR.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to, or under the jurisdiction of a zemindar; held by a zemindar.

"Under the zemindarry tenure, the land is perpetually assigned by the State, subject to the annual payment of a sum fixed for ever without change."—Field, Feb. 11, 1858.

B. As subst.: The office or jurisdiction of a zemindar; the land possessed by a zemindar.

"The possibility of an increase in the value of these zemindarries, due to causes of this nature."—Field, Feb. 11, 1858.

zē-nā'-ī-dā, s. [Etyim. not apparent.]

Ornith.: A genus of Columbidæ with ten species, founded by Booparte. They are distinguished by their stout body, short wings, and long, well-developed legs, and range from Chili and La Plata to Columbia and the Antilles.

zē-nā'-nā, s. [Pers. zenanah = pertaining to women, from zen = a woman.] The name given to the portion of the house reserved exclusively for the females belonging to a family of good caste in India.

"Yet, curiously enough, the ladies to a very large extent avoid the harems, the zenanas, the gynæcees provided for them."—Daily Telegraph, Feb. 24, 1858.

zenana-mission, s. A mission founded in 1852 under the auspices of the Protestant missionary societies in India, with the object (1) of sending the gospel to the women of India by means of female missionaries; (2) of alleviating their sufferings in sickness, and ministering to their spiritual need, through the agency of duly qualified female medical missionaries; and (3) of promoting education, based on Holy Scripture, especially among women of the higher classes.

Zēnd, s. [ZEND-AVESTA.]

I. Philol.: An ancient Iranian language in which are composed the sacred writings of the Zoroastrians. It is coeval and cognate with the Vedic Sanskrit. It embraces two dialects, called Bactrian, or Eastern Iranian, and the Western Iranian. The two Zend dialects consist of an earlier and a later, analogous to the Vedic and classic Sanskrit, or to the Homeric and classic Greek. The earlier dialect is called the Gāthā, from the Gāthas or sacred songs, which form the only remains of it; the later is that in which the Zend-Avesta, or sacred Zoroastrian writings are found. The present alphabet is comparatively modern, and is probably derived from the Syrian. There are twelve simple vowels, fourteen diphthongs, and twenty-nine consonants, represented by different characters. The roots are mostly monosyllabic, some consisting of only a single vowel, others of a vowel and consonant, or a vowel between two consonants. There are three numbers, singular, dual, and plural, with eight inflections in the first and last, and five in the middle number.

2. Compar. Relig.: A contracted name for the Zend-Avesta (q.v.).

Zend-Avesta, s. [Prob. = translation or commentary of text with paraphrase, from avesta = text, and zend = translation or commentary.]

Compar. Relig.: The sacred books of the Zoroastrians, Magians, Guebers, or Parsees, ascribed to Zoroaster himself, and revered as a bible or rule of faith and practice. They consist of several divisions: the Yasna, a sort of sacrificial ritual, consisting of hymns and prayers, contains the five gāthas in the older dialect; the Visparad is a collection of sacrificial prayers in later Zend. The Yashts are later collections of prayers, consisting of particular invocations of angels, &c., mixed with legends; the Vendidad contains the religious, civil, and criminal code of the Zoroastrians. The immortality of the soul, a future state of rewards and punishments, and the resurrection of the body are taught in the Zend religion.

zēn'-dik, s. [Arab. = a infidel, an atheist.] A name given in the East not only to disbelievers in revealed religion, but also to such as are accused of magical heresy.

zē-nick, zē-nik, s. [Native name in parts of Africa.]

Zool.: Suricata zenick. [SURIKATA.]

zēn'-ith, *sen-yth, s. [O. Fr. zenith (Fr. zenith), from Sp. zenit, zenith, from Arab. samt = a road, a way, a path, a trail, a quarter, whence samt-ar-ras = the zenith, the vertical point of the heavens; as-samt = an azimuth.]

I. Ord. Lang. & Astron.: The highest point in the heavens to a spectator at any given place, the point from which if the earth were absolutely spherical a perpendicular fall would pass through its centre.

"The sunne passeth twice in the yeere through their zenith over their heads."—Huchthuyt: Voyages, iii. 731.

2. Fig.: The highest point of a person's fortune; the highest or culminating point of any subject referred to.

"By my presence
I find my zenith doth depend upon
A most auspicious star."—Shakesp.: Tempest, i. 2.

zenith-distance, s. The zenith-distance of a heavenly body is the arc intercepted between the body and the zenith, being the same as the co-altitude of the body.

zenith-sector, s. An astronomical instrument, consisting of a telescope swinging upon pivots, and having attached to it an arc graduated into degrees and minutes. From the upper end of the telescope vertically hangs down a fine silver wire, terminated by a weight suspended in water to keep it steady. It is used for the same purpose as the mural circle, viz., to ascertain the zenith distance of the several stars, but is more convenient from its greater portability. [MURAL-CIRCLE.]

zenith-telescope, s. The telescope of a zenith sector.

* zēn'-ith-al, a. [Eng. zenith; -al.] Of or pertaining to the zenith.

"In order to obtain its zenithal distance."—Airy: Popular Astronomy, p. 34.

zē'-ō-lite, s. [Gr. ζέω (zēō) = to boil, and λίθος (lithos) = stone; Ger. zeolith.]

Min.: A name given to a group of minerals belonging to the hydrous silicates, characterized by much intumescence on the application of heat.

zē-ō-lith'-i-form, a. [Eng. zeolite(e); i connective, and form.] Having the form of zeolite.

zē-ō-lith'-ic, a. [Eng. zeolite(e); -ic.] Of or pertaining to zeolite; consisting of or resembling zeolite.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thère; pine, pīt, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; tr'y, S'yrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

Zēph-ā-nī-āh, s. [Heb. צפניה (Zephaniyah) = Zephaniah (whom Jehovah has hid): צָפַן (tsaphan) = to hide, and יָהוָה (Yah) = Jehovah; Sept. Ζοφορίας; Vulg. Sophonias.]

1. Script. Biog.: A prophet, son of Cushi, who again was the son of Gedaliah, the son of Amsiah, the son of Hizkiah (the king).

2. Old Test. Canon.: The ninth in order of the twelve minor prophetic books. Zephaniah prophesied in the reign of Josiah, king of Judah. Josiah, who came to the throne in his eighth year (a.c. 641), tolerated idolatry till the twelfth year of his reign (641-639); next for six years more (639-634) he carried on a partially successful contest against it; then during the remainder of his life (634-610), he made the reformation more sweeping, re-establishing Mosaic institutions throughout the land. When the prophet wrote, the worship of Baal had not quite ceased, nor had other forms of idolatry (Zeph. i. 4-5). His predictions, therefore, seem to have been uttered during the second period, some time between 630 and 624. With this agrees the reference in ch. ii. 12-15 to the impending destruction of Nineveh, which took place in 625. Zephaniah was contemporary with Jeremiah. The first chapter of the book denounces coming judgment, described as the day of the Lord (Dav. C. 3.), on Jerusalem and the Jewish people. The second prophesies the destruction of Gaza, Askalon, and the Philistine cities generally, the Moabites, the Ammonites, and the Assyrian capital Nineveh. The third censures the corruption of Jerusalem, which had affected princes, judges, priests, and prophets, and concludes with promises of future restoration and felicity. The chief characteristics of this book are the unity and harmony of the composition, the grace, energy, and dignity of its style, and the rapid and effective alternations of threats and promises. Its prophetic import is chiefly shown in the accurate predictions of the desolation which has fallen upon each of the nations denounced for their crimes; Ethiopia, which is menaced with a terrible invasion, being alone exempted from the doom of perpetual ruin. The general tone of the last portion is Messianic, but without any specific reference to the Person of our Lord. No serious controversy has ever taken place as to the authenticity of Zephaniah.

zē phar-ō vich-ite, s. [After Prof. Zepharovich; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A crystalline to compact mineral found in sandstone at Trenic, Bohemia. Hardness, 5.5; sp. gr. 2.37; colour, greenish, yellowish, or grayish-white. Compos.: essentially a hydrated phosphate of aluminum, with the probable formula Al₂O₃.PO₄ + 6H₂O.

zēph-yr, *zēph-yr-ūs, *zēph-ir, s. [Fr. zephyre = the west wind, from Lat. zephyrum, accus. of zephyrus = the west wind, from Gr. ζέφυρος (zēphuros), allied to ζόφος (zōphos) = darkness, gloom, the dark or evening quarter, the west.]

1. Ord. Lang. (Of all forms): The west wind; hence, poetically, any soft, mild, gentle breeze. By the poets Zephyrus was personified and represented as the mildest and gentlest of all the sylvan deities.

"Where sweet myrrh-breathing zephyr in the spring Gently distils his nectar-dropping showers" Drayton, Idea 58.

2. Entom. (Of the form zephyrus): A genus of Lycopside, having fore wings with eleven nervures, the subcostal one emitting two branches before the extremity of the discoidal cell, and a bifurcating one beyond. Species few, chiefly from Europe and Asia.

zēr-dā, s. [A South African word.]

Zool.: Sparmann's name for Canis or Megalcotis zerda, believed to be identical with the Fennec (q.v.).

zēr rē-nē, s. [Gr. ζερναιω (zērnaio) = to parch, to dry up.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Zerenidae.

zēr-rēn-i-dā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zeren(e); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.]

Entom.: A family of Geometrina. Antennae of the male thick, not pectinated; abdomen in the same sex long; wings broad, entire. Caterpillar short, thick, feeding exposed. Genera and species considerable in number.

zēr-ī-bā, za-rēō-bā, s. [Egypt. zerebak = a thorn hedge.] A word which came into use in the early part of 1864, during the military operations in Egypt, to denote an enclosure the sides of which are formed of prickly brushwood, sheltered by which a force may camp comparatively safe from sudden surprise.

SOLDIERS MAKING A ZERIBA.

"When the square was broken the news spread to the zeriba that we were defeated."—Graphic, April 6, 1864, p. 223.

zēr-rī-tis, s. [Mod. Lat., formed from Gr. ζερναιω (zērnaio) = to parch, to dry up.]

Entom.: A genus of Lycopside. Red butterflies with brown borders and metallic spots on the under surface of the hind wings. Natives of Africa.

zēr-ō, s. [Fr. = a cipher in arithmetic, from Ital. zero, a contracted form of zefiro or ziffo, parallel to cifra = a cipher, from Arsb. sifr = a cipher (q.v.). Zero and cipher are doublets.]

1. In common language, zero means no thing; in arithmetic it is called naught, and means no number; in algebra, it stands for no quantity, or for a quantity less than any assignable quantity; a cipher; nothing, denoted by 0.

2. Astron.: The first point of Aries. [ARIES.] (Prof. Airy: Pop. Astronomy, p. 119.)

3. Therm.: The point (0°) in the scale of a thermometer from which numbers with the + sign are counted upwards, and those with the - sign downwards. In Fahrenheit's thermometer zero is - 32°, i.e., 32 degrees below the freezing point of water. In the Centigrade and Reaumur's scales zero is that freezing point itself.

¶ Absolute zero: The point at which any given body is supposed to contain no heat. It is - 273° C. Temperatures reckoned from it are called absolute temperatures. It is fixed from observation of the fact that a gas is increased $\frac{1}{273}$ part of its volume for every degree of the Centigrade thermometer.

zero-point, s. The point indicating the commencement of any scale or reckoning.

zero-potential, s. [POTENTIAL, B. 2.]

zēst, s. [O. Fr. zest (Fr. zeste) = a piece of the skin of a citron or lemon, the English sense being due to the use of lemon or citron for flavouring, from Lat. schistos, schistus = divided, from Gr. σχιστός (schistos), from σχίζω (schizō) = to divide.]

*1. A piece of orange or lemon peel, used to give a flavour to liquor, or the fine thin oil that squirts out of it when squeezed; also the woody, thick skin quartering the kernel of a walnut.

2. Something which gives a relish or pleasant taste; something which serves to enhance enjoyment; hence, that quality which makes a thing enjoyable; a pleasant taste, a relish.

"Liberalty of disposition and conduct gives the highest zest and relish to social intercourse."—Cogan: Ethical Treat., Disc. I.

3. Relish or keenness of pleasure experienced; keen enjoyment; gusto.

"They joined and partook of the rade fare with the zest of fatigue and youth."—Lytton. Annals.

*zēst, v.t. [ZEST, s.]

1. To add a zest or relish to.

"When my wine's right, I never care it should be zested."—Cibber: Careless Husband, III.

2. To cut, as the peel of an orange or lemon, from top to bottom in thin slices, or to squeeze, as peel, over the surface of anything.

zē-tā, s. [Lat. zeta, for diæta = a chamber, a dwelling, from Gr. διαίρα (diætta) = a way of living, mode of life, a dwelling.] A little closet or chamber; applied by some writers to the room over the porch of a Christian church, where the sexton or porter resided, and kept the church documents. (Britton.)

*zē-tō-tic, a. & s. [Gr. ζητητικός (zēttikós), from ζήτηω (zēto) = to seek.]

A. As adj.: Proceeding by enquiry.

B. As subst.: A seeker; a name adopted by some of the Pyrrhonists.

zē-tō-tics, s. [ZETETIC.] A name given to that part of algebra which consists in the direct search after unknown quantities.

zē-tio-ū-la, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from Lat. zeta = a drawing-room, a summer-house.] A small withdrawing-room.

zēug-ite, s. [Gr. ζευγίτης (zeugitis) = yoked in pairs.]

Min.: An altered variety of Metabrushite (q.v.).

zēug-lō-dōn, s. [Gr. ζεύγηλον (zeugēlon) = the strap or loop of the yoke through which the oxen's heads were put; suff. -odon.]

Palæontology:

1. The type-genus of Zeuglodontidae (q.v.). The remains were formerly supposed to be reptilian, and were named Basilosaurus by Harlan. They were re-named by Owen (who demonstrated their mammalian character), and the new name was chosen because the first section of a molar examined was taken from the base of the crown, where it was beginning to divide into the roots, and thus it looked like two single teeth hooked or linked together. (Trans. Geol. Soc. Lond., ser. ii., vol. vi., p. 67.) The names Phocodon and Phocodontia are sometimes given to the genus and family respectively, from the seal-like character of the dentition. Several species from the Eocene of the United States; a portion of a skull from the Barton Clay (Eocene) of Hampshire, England.

TOOTH OF ZEUGLODONTIA.

2. Any species or individual of the Zeuglodontia (q.v.).

"The earliest Cetaceans of whose organization we have anything like complete evidence are the Zeuglodons of the Eocene period, which approach in the structure of skull and teeth to a more generalized mammalian type than either of the existing sub-orders. The smallness of the cerebral cavity compared with the jaws and the rest of the skull they share with the primitive forms of many other types."—Snyder, Brit. Ent. Club, xv. 303.

zēug-lō-dōnt, a. & s. [ZEUGLODONTIA.]

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to the Zeuglodontia.

B. As subst.: Any individual of the Zeuglodontia.

†zēug-lō-dōn-tī-ā (or t as sh), †zēug-lō-dōn-tī-dā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zeuglodon, genit. zeuglodontis; Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ia, or fem. -idae.]

Palæont.: A group or family founded to include certain extinct Cetaceans of doubtful affinities, only known by fragmentary remains of Eocene age. In the anterior part of both jaws the teeth are simple, conical, or slightly compressed, and sharp-pointed. Dental formula: 1. 3-3, c. 1-1, P.M. and M. 5-5 = 36. Skull elongated and much depressed, brain-very small, strong sagittal crest. The characters of the dorsal vertebrae and the articulation of the ribs appear to have resembled those of Platanista. Huxley considered these animals to have been intermediate between the true Cetaceans and the Seals. By some authorities the group is made to include Zeuglodon (= Phocodon), Squalodon, and Saurocetes. Prof. Flower substitutes for it a sub-order (Archæoceti), and makes the Squalodons a separate family. [SQUALODONTIDÆ.]

zēug-mā, s. [Gr., from ζεύγνυμι (zeugnumi) = to join.] [YORK.]

Gram.: The connexion of one word with two words or with two clauses, to both of bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -iing. -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -ston = shūn; -tion, -ston = zhūn. -ctous, -tious, -stous = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl dēl.

which it does not equally apply: so that, for one of them, another word (to be gathered from the sense of the passage) must be mentally supplied. Zeugma is therefore a species of ellipsis; both abbreviate discourse. Where the word to be supplied is a form of another in the sentence, as "I love you, and you [love] me," the construction is elliptical; where the sense requires a different word: as, "The sun shall not burn thee by day, neither the moon [injure thee] by night" (Ps. cxxi. 6, Prayer Book), it is zeugma.

zēg-māt-ic, a. [ZEUGMA.] Of or pertaining to the figure of speech known as zeugma.

zeun'-ēr-ite (eu as oi), s. [After Prof. Zeuner, of Freiberg; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: A tetragonal mineral, isomorphous with Uranite, which it most resembles in its physical characters. Hsrdness, 2 to 2.5; sp. gr. 3.2; colour, grass- and apple-green. Compos.: a hydrated arsenate of sesquioxide of uranium, and protoxide of copper. First found at the Weiser Hirsch mine, Schneeberg, Saxony.

zō-ūs, s. [Lat., from Gr. ζαῖος (zaios) = the dory or doree (q.v.)]

1. Ichthy.: A genus of Cyttidae, with six species from the Mediterranean, the temperate shores of the Eastern Atlantic, and the coasts of Japan and Australia, all of them in high esteem as food-fishes. A series of bony plates runs along the base of the dorsal and anal fins, and there is another series on the abdomen. The best-known species is Zeus faber, which was well known in classic times. [DORR.]

2. Palaeont.: From the Miocene of Licata, Sicily.

zeux'-ite, s. [Gr. ζεύξω (zeuxis) = a span, a joining; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: A variety of tourmaline (q.v.), found in the United Mines, St. Day, Cornwall. Occurred in acicular interlacing crystals of a pale-brown colour.

zeu'-zēr-a, s. [Gr. ζεύγνυμι (zeugnumi) = to join, to yoke.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Zeuzeridae (q.v.), with one British species. Antennae of the male pectinated at the base, the apex filiform; abdomen stout in the male, rather slender in the female.

zeu'-zēr-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zeuzer(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Bombycids. Antennae at least as long as the thorax, wings rather distant at the base. Caterpillar naked, with a bony plate on the second segment. It feeds within the stems of trees, reeds, &c. Among the best known species are those popularly called the Wood Leopard and the Goat Moth (q.v.).

zey'-lan-ite, s. [ZEILANITE.]

zēy'-sōum, s. [An Egyptian word.]

Bot.: The flowerheads of Santolina fragrantissima, sold in the shops of Cairo as a substitute for Camomile.

zīb-ēt, zīb-ēth, s. [Fr. zibet; Ital. zibetto; Low Gr. ζαβέτιον (zapetion).] [CIVET.]

Zool.: Viverra zibetha, a Sumatran civet. Length about two feet six inches, tail eleven inches; head rounded, bulging before the ears, and then rapidly contracting into a short muzzle; fur close, soft, and downy, with black and white lines on the back, and spots in transverse undulations on the back and sides; tail faintly ringed. In Travancore, in India, there was a government establishment for the rearing of these animals, the civet obtained from them being used in perfumery and in Hindoo medicine.

zī-bē-thūm (th as t), s. [ZIBET.] The civet derived from the Zibeth (q.v.).

zī-g-ga, s. [Etym. doubtful.] Curd produced from milk by adding acetic acid, and after rennet has ceased to cause coagulation. [Brandé & Cox.]

zīō-tris-ī-lite, s. [After Zietrisiska, Moldavia, where found; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: A member of the group of hydrocarbons resembling ozocerite in its physical characters, but differing from that substance in its almost complete insolubility in ether. A mean of three analyses gave: carbon, 84.64; hydrogen, 14.63.

zīf, zīph, zīv, s. [Heb. זִיפ (ziv), from זָפַח (zachach) = to shine, to be beautiful, referring to the splendid appearance of the flowers during the month (Gesenius); or from Assyrian Ziv = the Bull, the constellation Taurus. (Rawlinson; Herod. i. 622.)]

Hebrew Calendar: The second month of the year, extending from the new moon in May to that in June; or, according to some Rabbis, from the new moon in April to that of June. (1 Kings vi. l. 37.) In some copies of the A.V. the spelling is Zif, in others Ziph; in the R.V. Ziv, which is the correct form.

* zīf'-fī-lis, s. [Etym. doubtful; perhaps for ziphias = the sword-fish.] Some sea monster.

"Huge ziffus whom mariners eschew."
Spenser; F. Q. II. xii. 24.

zīg-ān'-ka, s. [RUSS.]

Music: A dance popular among the Russian peasantry, similar in its figures to the English country dance.

zīg-a-rī, s. pl. [ZINGARI.]

zīg-zāg, a. & s. [Fr., from Ger. zichzack = a zigzag; zichzack seglein = to tack in sailing; Sw. sichsack = zigzag.]

A. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Having sharp or quick turns or flexures.

"More zigzag paths tempt us right and left."
Queen, Book 26, 1834.

2. Bot.: [FLEXUOUS, 2.]

B. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: Something having short, sharp turns or angles, as a line.

"But that accent was made by only six zigzags."
Scribner's Magazine, August, 1877, p. 462.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: A zigzag moulding; a chevron or dancette. [See illustration under CHEVRON.]

2. Fort.: One of the trenches leading towards the besieged works, and communicating between the several parallels. It turns to the right and to the left, but with a general curved course, in such a manner as not to be enfiladed by the guns of the fort.

3. A salmon-stair, fish-way, or fish-ladder.

zigzag-moulding, s. [CHEVRON, DANCETTE.]

zīg-zāg, v. t. & i. [ZIGZAG, a.]

A. Trans.: To form with short sharp turns or angles.

"The middle alle has on each side four Norman round arches zigzagged."
Warton: History of Kidlington, p. 4.

B. Intransitive:

I. To move or advance in a zigzag fashion; to make zigzags.

"He zigzagged back and forth from tuft to tuft."
Scribner's Magazine, July, 1877, p. 284.

2. To waver in, or change one's words or opinions.

"Speak in ambiguous and hesitating tones, zigzagging this way and that way, and beating about the bush."
Daily Telegraph, Dec. 28, 1867.

* zīg-zāg-ēr-ŷ, s. [Eng. zigzag; -ery.] Zigzag or irregular course.

"When my Uncle Toby discovered the transverse zigzaggery of my father's approach to it."
Sterne: Tristram Shandy, II. 113.

† zīg-zāg-gŷ, a. [Eng. zigzag; -y.] Having sharp turns; zigzag.

"The zigzaggy pattern by Saxons invented Was cleverly chiselled and well represented."
Barham: Ing. Leg.; St. Romwold.

zīl-la, s. [The Egyptian name of Zilla myagroides.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Zillidae (q.v.). Zilla myagroides, is a large glabrous herb, with round white branches, and oblong toothed leaves, which are boiled and eaten by the Arabs like cabbage. (Loudon.)

zīl-lah, s. [Hind.] In Hindustan, a local division of a county; a shire or county.

zīll-ēr-thite, s. [After Zillerth(al), Tyrol, where found; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: A name given to a bright green variety of Actinolite (q.v.).

zīl-lī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zill(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of Orthoploceæ. Silicle indehiscent, sub-globose, one or two-celled, each with a single globose seed. Herbs from the Mediterranean region.

zīm-a-pān-ite, s. [After Zimapan, Mexico, where found; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: Stated to be a chloride of iron, crystallizing in the rhombohedral system. A doubtful species.

zīmb (b silent), s. [Arab. = a fly.]

Entom.: A dipterous insect described by Bruce as being common in Abyssinia. It is said to resemble the tsetse (q.v.) of the southern parts of Africa, and to be equally hurtful to cattle. It is a little larger than the common bee, and thicker in proportion.

zīm-ōnt-wā-tēr, s. [Ger. cementwasser, lit. = cement or cementation water; cf. cementkupfer = copper deposited in water.] A name given to water found in copper mines; water impregnated with copper.

zī-mōo'-ca, s. [Etym. doubtful.] (See etym. and compound.)

Zool.: Euspongia zimocca, a sponge with a dark brownish-yellow skeleton, the chief fibres of which are soft, thin, elastic, and almost free from sand, while the under fibres are dense and thick, rendering the sponge itself abnormally hard.

zī-mōme, s. [ZYMOE.]

zīno, s. [Dan. and Sw. zink; Fr. zinc; cogn. with Ger. zinn = tin.]

1. Astron.: It has been ascertained by spectroscopy that there is zinc in the sun.

2. Chem. & Comm.: A divalent metallic element, symb. Zn; at. wt., 65; found in considerable abundance in many parts of Britain, in Silesia, and in the neighbourhood of Aix la Chapelle. It is extracted from the native carbonate by first roasting the ore, mixing it with charcoal or coke, and subjecting this mixture to a full red heat in an earthen retort. The reduced metal volatilizes, and is condensed by suitable means. It is bluish-white, tarnishes slowly in the air, is crystalline and brittle, with a density varying from 6.8 to 7.2. Between 121° and 149° it has the property of becoming malleable, and after such treatment retains this character when cold. At 411° it melts, and at a bright red heat boils and volatilizes. Ordinary zinc dissolves readily in dilute acids, but pure zinc is less soluble unless it is in contact with platinum, copper, or some other less positive metal, with which it can form a galvanic circuit. Solutions of zinc give a white precipitate with hydric sulphide. In consequence of its lightness and cheapness, sheet zinc is employed for lining baths and cisterns, for gutters, apouts, and roofs; for the latter purpose it is usually corrugated. Zinc plates are much used as generators of electricity in voltaic batteries and in zincography (q.v.). Zinc is also an important factor in the manufacture of alloys, and in the preparation of galvanized iron (q.v.).

3. Pharm.: Oxide of zinc given in small doses is a tonic and astringent, acting beneficially on the nervous system in chorea, epilepsy, hysteria, neuralgia, &c.; in large doses it is emetic; externally it is a desiccant and astringent. Sulphate of zinc and acetate of zinc produce similar effects. So apparently does the carbonate, which, however, is not much employed medicinally. Chloride of zinc is used externally as an escharotic; valerate of zinc is a nervous tonic and antispasmodic, also an anthelmintic. (Garrod.)

¶ Zinc occurs somewhat abundantly in the United States, where its production is rapidly increasing. In 1889, the yield was 58,860; in 1890, 63,683; in 1891, 80,334 short tons, chiefly smelted in Illinois, Kansas and Missouri. In Great Britain the annual yield of the zinc mines is about 23,000 tons, half of it coming from Wales.

Chem.: The inappreciable oxide formed when zinc is heated in contact with air.

zīno-azurite, s.

Min.: A mineral of uncertain composition, said to have been found in ansl blue crystals in the Sierra Almagrera, Spain. Plattner fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, quīte, ōur, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

states that it consists of sulphate of zinc, carbonate of copper, and some water. (Dana.) zinc-butter, s. [ZINC-CHLORIDE.]

zinc-chloride, s.

Chem.: $ZnCl_2$. Zinc-butter. Easily prepared by dissolving the metal in hydrochloric acid. It is a nearly white translucent substance, fusible, and very deliquescent; easily soluble in water and alcohol, and forming a double salt with sal-ammoniac; very useful in tinning and soft soldering copper and iron. It is also useful as an antiseptic, and, like sulphuric acid, withdraws the elements of water from organic bodies.

zinc-cyanide, s.

Chem.: $Zn(CN)_2 = Zn(CN)_2$. A white insoluble powder, obtained by adding hydrocyanic acid to zinc acetate. It is decomposed by acids with evolution of hydrocyanic acid, but is soluble in excess of potassic cyanide, the solution yielding on evaporation octahedral crystals of potassic zinc cyanide.

zinc-ethide, s. [ZINC-ETHYL.]

zinc-ethyl, s.

Chem.: $Zn(C_2H_5)_2$. Zinc-ethide. An organo-metallic compound discovered by Frankland, and formed by heating ethyl iodide with zinc in a sealed glass tube or copper cylinder. The zinc ethyl iodide is first formed, which, when distilled in an atmosphere of hydrogen, is resolved into zinc iodide and zinc ethyl. It is a mobile, volatile, and disagreeably smelling liquid, boiling at 118° , and having a specific gravity of 1.182. It takes fire instantly on coming in contact with the air, and water decomposes it violently with formation of zinc hydroxide and ethane ($ZnH_2O_2 + C_2H_6$).

zinc-fahlerz, s.

Min.: A variety of Tetrahedrite (q.v.), containing zinc.

zinc-iodide, s.

Chem.: ZnI_2 . Obtained by digesting iodine with excess of zinc and water, till the colour of the iodine disappears. It separates in regular octahedral or cubo-octahedral crystals, is very deliquescent, and dissolves easily in water. When heated in contact with the air, it is decomposed, iodine being evolved and zinc oxide produced.

zinc-methido, s. [ZINC-METHYL.]

zinc-methyl, s.

Chem.: $Zn(CH_3)_2$. Zinc-methide. Prepared in the same manner as zinc-ethyl. It is a colourless mobile liquid, boiling at 46° , and having a specific gravity of 1.386 at $10^\circ 5'$, and is spontaneously inflammable. These compounds enable us to build up carbon compounds from others lower in the scale. With carbon oxychloride they form ketones, e.g., $COCl_2 + Zn(CH_3)_2 = ZnCl_2 + CO(CH_3)_2$ (acetone).

zinc-oxide, s.

Chem.: ZnO . Zinc white. Prepared by burning zinc in atmospheric air. It is a white, tasteless powder, insoluble in water, but freely soluble in acids, and is employed as a substitute for white lead, especially in paint work that is exposed to the action of the fumes of sulphuretted hydrogen.

zinc-oxychloride, s.

Chem.: $ZnCl_2 \cdot 3ZnO \cdot 4H_2O$. Basic chloride of zinc. Obtained by evaporating to dryness an aqueous solution of zinc chloride. It is a white powder, insoluble in water, and giving off half its combined water when heated to 100° . It is used as a paint for wood, stone, or metal, dries quickly, and is free from odour.

zinc-phyllite, s.

Min.: The same as HOPEITE (q.v.)

zinc-spinel, s.

Min.: The same as AUTOMOLITE (q.v.)

zinc-sulphate, s.

Chem.: $ZnSO_4 + 7OH_2$. White vitriol. Prepared by dissolving the metal in dilute sulphuric acid, or by roasting the native sulphide. Its crystals are hardly to be distinguished by the eye from sulphate of magnesia. It has an astringent metallic taste, dissolves in two and a half parts of cold and in a much smaller quantity of hot water, and is chiefly used in calico-printing.

zinc-vitriol, s. [ZINC-SULPHATE.]

zinc-white, s. [ZINC-OXIDE.]

zinc, v.t. [ZINC, s.] To coat or cover with zinc. [GALVANIZE.]

zinc-a-cët'-a-mide, s. [Eng. zinc, and acetamide.]

Chem.: $C_4H_8ZnN_2O_2$. A white powder formed by the action of acetamide on zinc-ethyl.

zinc-a-lū'-mīn-ite, s. [Eng. zinc, and aluminate.]

Min.: A mineral occurring in minute hexagonal plates at the Laurium mines, Greece. Hardness, 2.5 to 3.0; sp. gr. 2.26; colour, white. Compos.: a hydrated sulphate of alumina and zinc, with the formula $2ZnSO_4 + 4ZnH_2O_2 + 3Al_2H_6O_8 + 5aq.$, which requires, sulphuric acid, 12.43; alumina, 24.12; oxide of zinc, 38.12; water, 25.28 = 100.

zinc-ām'-yl, zinc-ām'-yl-ide, s. [Eng. zinc, and amyl; -ide.]

Chem.: $Zn(C_5H_{11})_2$. Zincamylide. A colourless, transparent, mobile liquid, prepared by heating zinc with mercuric amylide. It has a sp. gr. of 1.022 at 0° , boils at 220° , but gradually decomposes at 240° , yielding amylene and amylidic hydride. In contact with the air it fumes, and when dropped into oxygen gas burns with a dazzling white flame and slight explosion.

zinc-ām'-yl-ide, s. [ZINCAMYL.]

zinc-ic, a. [Eng. zinc; -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or containing zinc.

zinc-īf'-ēr-ōus, a. [Eng. zinc, s., and Lat. fero = to bear, to produce.] Producing zinc: as, zinciferous ore.

zinc-ite, s. [Eng. zinc; suff. -ite (Min.); Ger. zinkit, rothzinkerz; Fr. zinc oxydé.]

Min.: A mineral of sparse occurrence, at present only known to have been found at certain mines in Sussex County, New Jersey. Crystallization hexagonal; hardness, 4 to 4.5; sp. gr. 5.43 to 5.7; lustre sub-adamantine; color, deep-red, streak orange-yellow; translucent to sub-translucent; fracture, sub-conchoidal; brittle. Compos.: oxygen, 19.74; zinc, 80.26 = 100, whence the formula ZnO .

zinc'-en-ite, zink'-en-ite, s. [After Herr Zincken, the director of the Anhalt mines; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral, occurring mostly in divergent groups of hexagonal prisms at Wolfsberg, in the Hartz Mountains. Hardness, 3 to 3.5; sp. gr., 5.30 to 5.35; lustre, metallic; colour and streak, steel-gray; opaque. Compos.: sulphur, 22.1; antimony, 42.6; lead, 35.3 = 100, thus yielding the formula $PbS + Sb_2S_3$.

zinc'-kŷ, zink'-ŷ, a. [Eng. zinc, a; -y.] Pertaining to zinc; containing zinc; having the appearance of zinc.

zīn-cō-, pref. [Eng. zinc, and a connect.] Of or pertaining to zinc (q.v.)

* zincopolar, a.

Galv.: A term applied to the surface of the zinc presented to the acid in a battery.

zīn-cō-ōde, s. [Eng. zinc, and Gr. ōdos (hodos) = a way.] The positive pole of a galvanic battery.

zīn-cō-graph, s. [Eng. zinc, and Gr. γράφω (graphō) = to write, to draw.] A design drawn by zincography (q.v.); an impression taken from such a design.

* Illustrated with full-page tinted zincographs.—Field, Jan. 23, 1886.

zīn-cōg'-ra-phēr, s. [Eng. zincograph; -er.] One who practises zincography.

zīn-cō-graph'-ic, zīn-cō-graph'-ic-al, a. [Eng. zincograph(y); -ic, -ical.] Pertaining or relating to zincography.

zīn-cōg'-ra-phŷ, s. [ZINCOGRAPHY.] An art in its essential features similar to lithography, the stone printing-surface of the latter being replaced by that of a plate of polished zinc. The design is drawn on the zinc-plate with a material which resists acid. The surface of the plate being bitten away leaves the design in relief to be printed from by the ordinary mode in printing from woodcuts. The first attempts at zincography were made by H. W. Eberhard of Magdeburg in 1805.

zīn'-ōld, a. [Eng. zinc; suff. -oid.] Resembling zinc; pertaining to zinc.

* zīn'-ōl'-ŷ-sis, s. [Pref. zīnco-, and Gr. λύσις (lusis) = setting free.]

Elect.: The same as ELECTROLYSIS (q.v.)

* zīn'-cō-lŷte, s. [Pref. zīnco-, and Gr. λύσις (lusis) = that may be dissolved.]

Elect.: The same as ELECTROLYTE (q.v.)

zīn'-cō-nīne, s. [Eng. zinc; or connect., and suff. -ine (Min.).]

Min.: The same as HYDROZINCITE (q.v.)

zīn'-cō-nīse, s. [Eng. zinc; or connect., and Gr. κόμης (komis) = powder.]

Min.: The same as HYDROZINCITE (q.v.)

zīn'-cō-gīte, zīn'-kō-gīte, s. [Eng. zinc; or connect., and suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A doubtful mineral, said to be an anhydrous sulphate of zinc, occurring in crystals isomorphous with those of anglesite and barytes.

zīn'-cō-us, a. [Eng. zinc, s.; -ous.] Pertaining to zinc, or to the positive pole of a voltaic battery.

zīn'-ōx'-ŷl, s. [Eng. zinc, s.; oxygen, and -yl.]

Chem.: The name given to the diatomic radical, O_2Zn .

zīn'-dī-kīte, s. [Anglicised from the Arabic name.]

Muhammadanism (Pl.): A heretical sect who believe that the world was produced from four eternal elements, and that man is a microcosm. They disbelieve in God, the resurrection, and a future life. (Brewer.)

zīn'-ga-rī, zīn'-ga-noō, zīg'-a-rī, s. [See extract.] A gypsy (q.v.)

* A remarkably perfect epauymic historical myth accounting for the gypsies of Egyptians may be found cited seriously in "Blackstone's Commentaries": when Sultan Belim conquered Egypt in 1517, several of the natives refused to submit to the Turkish yoke, and revolted under one Zinganes, whence the Turks called them Zinganes, but, being at length surrounded and annihilated, they agreed to disperse in small parties over the world, &c. &c.—Tyler: Trin. Cult. (ed. 1878) 1. 400.

zīng'-el (z as dz), s. [Low Ger.]

Ichthy.: A name applied by some writers to any individual or species of the genus Aspro (q.v.). The name is more properly limited to the type-species, Aspro zingel, about a foot long, with a weight of two pounds; back greenish-brown, sides yellowish with a shade of gray, belly whitish, four cloudy brownish-black bands, more or less distinct, on sides. Found in the Danube and its larger tributary streams. (Seeley: Freshwater Fishes of Europe.)

* zīn'-ghō, s. [ZINC, s.]

zīn'-gī-an, a. [Ety. doubtful.]

Philol.: A name sometimes given to the South African family of tongues. Called also Bantu and Chusna. A peculiarity of this family is the use of clicks or clicks in speaking. [Click, s., A. II. 1.]

zīn'-gī-bēr, s. [Lat. zingiberi, from Gr. ζιγγίβεις (zinggiberis) = ginger.]

Bot.: Ginger; the typical genus of Zingiberaceæ. Indian herbs with creeping, jointed, woody rootstocks; leaves in two ranks, sheathing the stem, flowers in conical spikes. Inner limbs of the corolla with only one lip, and the anther with a simple recurved horn at the end. Zingiber officinale is the Common Ginger; it is cultivated throughout India. [GINGER.] Z. Cassumunar is said to be carminative, like the former species.

zīn'-gī-bēr-ā'-gē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zingiber; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æceæ.]

Bot.: Gingerworts; an order of Endogens, the typical one of the alliance Arnoniales. Aromatic herbs, with a creeping, often jointed rhizome. Stem simple, formed of the cohering bases of the leaves; leaves simple, sheathing, with a single midrib, from which very numerous parallel veins diverge at an acute angle and proceed to the margin; flowers generally in pairs, and lying among bōl, bōŷ; pōut, jōwī; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -clous, -tious, -sious = shūa, -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

spathaceous bracts; calyx superior, short, tubular, three-lobed; corolla, tubular, irregular, with six segments in two whorls, the inner, morphologically viewed, being transformed sterile stamens, untransformed stamens, three, two of them abortive; filament of the former not petaloid; anther, two-celled; style, filliform; stigma, dilated, hollow; ovary, more or less perfectly three-celled, with the placenta in the axis; fruit, usually a capsule, three- or sometimes one-celled; seeds, many. Closely akin to Marantaceae, with which they were formerly combined, but differ in their two-celled anther, and in the possession of a vitellus round the embryo. Natives of the East Indies and some other tropical countries. Genera, twenty-nine; species 247. (Lindley.) zín-ǵi-běr-á-cooús (ce as sh), a. [Mod. Lat. zingiberaceus (v); Eng. adj. suff. -ous.] Of or pertaining to ginger or the Zingiberaceae (q.v.).

zínk-ən-íte, s. [ZINCKENITE.]

zínk-ý, a. [ZINCK.]

zín-ní-á, s. [Named after John Godfrey Zinn (1727-59), professor of botany at Gotttingen.]

Bot.: A genus of Heliosideae, with six or seven species. Ray consisting of five persistent florets; fruit crowned by two awns. Elegant American plants. They are cultivated for the beauty of their flowers.

zinnwaldite (as dzinn-váld-íte), s. [After Zinnwald, Bohemia, where found; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: A variety of LEPIDOLITE (q.v.).

zín-zí-běr, s. [ZINGIBER.]

zín-zí-běr-á-ǵe-æ, s. pl. [ZINOISERACEÆ.]

zín-zí-běr-á-ǵeons (ce as sh), a. [ZINOISERACEOUS.]

Zí-ón, s. [Heb. צִיּוֹן (tsion) = exposed on a sunny place; צִיּוֹן (tsachak) = to shine, to glow with heat, to be exposed to the sun.]

1. Lit.: A manor or emineoce of Jerusalem, the royal residence of David and his successors.

2. Figuratively:

- (1) A dissenting chapel. [BETHEL, 2. (1).]
- (2) The theocracy or church of God.

zìph-í-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. ziphii (us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of Cetacea, equivalent to Ziphiinæ (q.v.).

zìph-í-i-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. ziphii (us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Zool.: A sub-family of Physteridæ, with four genera, Hyperoodon, Mesoplodon, Berardius, and Ziphius (q.v.). Teeth of mandible rudimentary, except one or two pairs, which may be largely developed, especially in the males; spiracle single, crescentic; pectoral fin small, ovate, all five digits well developed. They appear to feed chiefly on small cephalopods, and occur singly or in small herds.

zìph-í-òid, a. & s. [Mod. Lat. ziphii (us); Eng. suff. -oid.]

A. As adj.: Of, belonging to, or resembling the sub-family Ziphinæ (q.v.).

B. As subst.: Any individual of the Ziphinæ (q.v.).

zìph-í-ús, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. ζιφος (ziphos) = a straight sword. Named from the pointed snout of the species.]

Zool. & Palæont.: A genus of Ziphiinæ (q.v.). Several species have been described, some of them probably under more than one name. The best known is the type Ziphius cavirostris, from the Mediterranean. It was an imperfect skull of this species, picked up on the Mediterranean coast of France, in 1804, and described by Cuvier, who thought that it belonged to an extinct animal, in his Ossémens Fossiles, that the genus was founded. Teeth of this or of an allied species from the Suffolk and Antwerp Crag.

SKULL OF ZIPHIUS CAVIROSTRIS.

zìr-pé-íte (z as tz), s. [After Prof. Zippe, the mineralogist at Prague; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: A mineral occurring as an alteration product of uraninite (q.v.) at Joachimsthal, Bohemia. Acicular, sometimes in rosette-like groups of needles or small botryoidal. Hardness, 8.0; colour, shades of yellow. Compos.: essentially a hydrated sulphate of sesquioxide of uranium.

zìr-carb-íte, s. [Eng. zircon (con), carb(onate), and suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: A name given by C. U. Shepard to a doubtful mineral whose chemical composition was undetermined. Stated to have been found with cyrtolite, at the granite quarries of Rockport, Massachusetts.

zìr-côn, zìr-côn-íte, s. [The Cingalese name.]

Min.: A mineral occurring only in crystals or crystalline grains. Crystallization, tetragonal. Hardness, 7.5; sp. gr. 4.05 to 4.75; lustrous, adamantine; colour, very variable, shades of red, yellow, brown, green, &c.; translucent to transparent. Compos.: silica, 33.0; zirconia, 67.0 = 100, hence the formula ZrO_2SiO_2 . Dana adopts the following altered varieties as sub-species: Malacon, Cyrtolite, Tachyphalite, (Erstedite, Auerbachite, and Bragite. (See these words.)

zircon-syenite, s.

Petrol.: A variety of Syenite (q.v.), characterized by the presence of zircon in distributed crystals.

zìr-côn-ate, s. [Eng. zircon (ic); -ate.]

Chem. (Pl.): Compounds of zirconia with the stronger bases.

zìr-cô-ní-á, s. [ZIRCONIUM.] [ZIRCONIUM-OXIDE.]

zirconia-light, s. One in which a stick of oxide of zirconium is exposed to the flame of oxy-hydrogen gas. Invented by Tessié du Motay.

zìr-côn-íc, a. [Eng. zirconium]; -ic.] Derived from or containing zirconium.

zirconic-acid, s.

Chem.: Zirconia in combination with bases.

zìr-côn-íte, s. [ZIRCON.]

zìr-cô-ní-ùm, s. [Mod. Lat., from zircon (q.v.).]

Chem.: A tetratomic element intermediate between aluminium and silicon; symb. Zr; at. wt., 90; first obtained from zirconite by Klaproth in 1789. Like silicon, it is capable of existing in three different states, amorphous, crystalline, and graphitoid. The amorphous and crystalline are obtained by processes similar to those described for preparing the corresponding modifications of silicon (q.v.). The graphitoid variety is obtained in light scales of a steel-gray colour, by decomposing sodium zirconate with iron. It is but slowly attacked by sulphuric, nitric, or hydrochloric acid, even when heated, but dissolves readily in hydrofluoric acid.

zirconium-chloride, s.

Chem.: $ZrCl_4$. A white crystalline mass prepared by heating zirconium in chlorine gas. When treated with water, it is converted into oxychloride of zirconium, $ZrOCl_2 \cdot 3H_2O$.

zirconium-oxide, s.

Chem.: ZrO_2 . Zirconia. A white, tasteless, inodorous powder, obtained by heating zirconium to redness in contact with the air. It is insoluble in ordinary acids, soluble with difficulty in hydrofluoric acid, but dissolves readily when heated with concentrated sulphuric acid.

zìrl-íte, s. [After Zirl, Tyrol, where found; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: A name given by Pichler to an opal-like hydrate of alumina, probably identical with gibbsite (q.v.).

zìther, zìthern (as zít' -ér, zít' -èrn), s. [Ger., from Lat. cithara (q.v.).] [CITTERN.]

Musie.: A development of the instrument known to the Greeks as cithara (q.v.). In the early part of the nineteenth century it became a favourite with the peasantry of the Styrian and Bavarian Alps, and was introduced into England about 1850, chiefly by Herr Curt Schulz. The zither consists of a resonance-box, with a large circular sound-hole near the middle; the strings, thirty-two in number, in some cases increased to forty and even forty-six, being made of steel, brass, or copper, and silk covered with fine silver or copper wire, and tuned by pegs at one end. Five of the strings are stretched over a fretted keyboard, and are used to play the melody, the fingers of the left hand stopping the strings on the frets, the right hand thumb, armed with a metal ring, striking the strings, which are tuned in fifths, and have a chromatic range from c in the second space of the bass staff to d on the sixth ledger line above the treble. The remainder, called the accompaniment strings, are struck by the first three fingers of the right hand, and, as they are not stopped, produce only the single note to which they are tuned. Whilst playing the performer rests the instrument on a table with the key-board side nearest to him. The viola zither, in which the resonance-box is heart-shaped, is tuned like the violin (q.v.), and is played with a bow. The form of the instrument is like that of the viola, but the body rests on the lap of the seated player, while the head is placed on the edge of a table.

zì-zá-ní-a, s. [Lat., from Gr. ζιζάνιον (zizanon) = the darnel.]

Bot.: A genus of Oryzæ. A grass with monococious flowers, the males being above and the females below on the panicle. Males with small, round, membranous glumes and two pales, the inferior one five-nerved and the superior one three-nerved. Females without glumes; pales two, the lower seven-nerved, the upper three-nerved. Known species five. Zizania aquatica is Canada rice. It has a pyramidal panicle of flowers, and is commonly met with in streams in North America, from Canada to Florida. The seeds, which are bland and farinaceous, are largely eaten by the North American Indians, and also support multitudes of wild fowl. It was once cultivated in Middlesex and in Ross-shire.

zì-zél, s. [SOULIK.]

zì-zý-phús, s. [Lat., from Gr. ζιζυφόν (zizyphon) = the tree whose fruit is the jujuba.] [See def.]

1. Bot.: A genus of Rhamnacæ. Shrubs or small trees, with spiny stipules, alternate three-nerved leaves, a spreading five-cleft calyx, five hood-like petals, five stamens, a five-angled disk, adhering to the tube of the calyx, and having enclosed within it the two- or three-celled ovary. Fruit berry-like, the stone or kernel with two or three cells, and a single flattened seed in each. Widely distributed, but having their metropolis in the subtropical parts of the Eastern hemisphere. The berries of Zizyphus Jujuba, the Indian plum, cultivated throughout India and Burmah, are eaten both by Europeans and natives. They are called Jujubes, and are of a mucilaginous, mawkish taste. Z. vulgaris, wild in the Punjab, and cultivated in Bengal, also furnishes some of the jujubes of commerce. The fruits of Z. nummularia, Z. rugosa, and Z. Erioplia are also eaten in India, but are inferior to the genuine jujubes. The fruit of Z. Jazeira is eaten like jujubes in Brazil. Z. Lotus is by some believed to be the Lote-tree (q.v.) or Lote-bush, the fruit of which produced such effects on the classical Lotophagi (q.v.). It grows in Barbary, where it is called sádr, and its berries, which are collected for food, nabk. The negroes of the Gambia prepare a wine from the fermented berries of Z. orthocenthus. The fruit of Z. nummularia, which grows in India, is considered to be cool and astringent, and it is given in bilious disorders. The bark of Z. Jujuba is said to be a remedy for diarrhoea; the root in decoction is given in fever, and, powdered, is applied to sores. In the Himalaya districts the bark is used as a tan and a dye-stuff. The bark of Z. zeyheri, a large scrambling shrub found in the hilly parts of India, is also used for tanning and for dyeing black. The root of Z. Niposa is given as a remedy in windy colic. Z. Jujuba, Z. nummularia, Z. rugosa, and Z. vulgaris, yield a gum. A decoction of the leaves of Z. glabrata is said to purify the blood. The dried fruits of Z. vulgaris are considered astringent, expectorant, and fitted to purify the blood. The bark is used as an application to wounds and sores. The kernels of Z. saponifera are regarded by the Chinese as soporific. The bark of Z. Joazeiro is bitter, astringent, somewhat acrid, and tends to produce sickness. Z. Baobab, from the Gambia, is believed to be poisonous.

2. Palaeobot.: Two species of Zizyphus are found in the Middle Eocene of England.

zō-, pref. [ZOO.]

zō-ōd'-u-lōs, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. ζῷον (zōōn) = life, and ὄδον (ōdōn) = a gland.]

Bot.: The locomotive spores of some Coniferæ.

zō-ān-thār'-ī-a, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from zoanthus (q.v.).]

Zool. & Palæont.: An order of the class Actinozoa (q.v.), having the chambers and tentacles generally six in number, or constituting some multiple of six, however largely they may be increased. The Zoantharia are divided into three sections, according to the character of the skeletal structure:—

1. Zoantharia Malacodermata, containing the Sea-anemones and their allies. There are three families: Actiniæ, Ilyanthisiæ, and Zoanthidæ (q.v.). The group is cosmopolitan, and preëminently characteristic of the littoral and laminarian zones, very few forms extending to 500 fathoms, and but one genus being pelagic. They have left no trace in time.

2. Zoantharia Sclerobasica: Black Corals, principally from the warmer seas, but found at various points in the North Atlantic, and recorded from Greenland; depth from 100 to several hundred fathoms. [CORAL, s., ¶ 1.]

3. Zoantharia Sclerodermata. [MADREPORARIA.]

zō-ān'-thī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zoanthus]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: The type-family of Zoantharia Malacodermata. Polypes adherent, united by a creeping or crust-like encosare, rarely solitary, incapable of locomotion. True corallum absent; a pseudo-skeleton, generally formed by particles of stone or sand embedded in the ectoderm. [ZOANTHUS, EPIZOANTHUS, POLYTHOEA.]

zō-ān'-thrō-pý, s. [Pref. zō-, and Gr. ἀνθρώπος (anthrōpos) = a man.]

Pathol.: A kind of monomania in which the patient believes himself transformed into one of the lower animals. Lycanthropy (q.v.) comes under this head.

zō-ān'-thūs, s. [Pref. zō-, and Gr. ἄνθος (anthos) = a flower.]

Zool.: The type-genus of Zoanthidæ (q.v.). Body elongated, conic, and pedunculated, springing from a base common to several polypes; mouth linear and transverse, in the centre of a disc bordered by short, slender tentacula. The sole European species of the genus, Zoanthus couchii, is found on the British coasts.

zō-ar'-cōs, s. [Gr. ζωάρκος (zōarkōs) = supporting or maintaining life; ζῷον (zōōn) = life, and ἄρκω (arkō) = to support.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Blenniidæ, with two species: Zoarces viviparus, the Viviparous Blenny (q.v.), from the European, and Z. anguillar, from the North American side of the Atlantic. The latter is by far the larger, reaching a length of from two to three feet. Body elongate, with rudimentary scales; conical teeth in jaws; dorsal fin long, with a depression on tail; no separate caudal fin; ventrals short, formed by three or four rays; gill-openings wide.

zō-bō, zō-bū, s. [Native name.]

Zool.: (See extract.)
"Among the characteristic animals [of the Tibetan Himalaya] may be named the yak, from which is reared a cross breed with the ordinary horned cattle of India—locally called z-bū.—Encyc. Brit. (ed. 8th) xi. 583.

zōc'-ōs, zō'-cīe, zōc'-ō-lō, s. [Ital. zoccolo, from Lat. zoculus = a sock (q.v.).]

Arch.: A Socle (q.v.).

zō-dī-āc, zō'-dī-āc, zō-dī-āc-kē, zō-dī-āc-kē, s. [Fr. zodiacque, from Lat. zodiacus, from Gr. ζωδιακός (zōdiakos) = of or pertaining to animals, whence δ ζωδιακός (ho zōdiakos) = the zodiac circle, so called from containing the twelve constellations represented by animals, from ζωδιον (zōdion) = a small animal, dimin. from ζῷον (zōōn).] [ZOOON.]

* 1. Ord. Lang.: A girdle, a belt, a zone.

Asin a glistening zodiac, hung his sword."
Milton: P. L., xl. 247.

2. Astron.: The zone or broad belt of constellations which the sun traverses during the year in passing around the ecliptic. The moon and major planets also move within the same area. The breadth of the zodiac is about eight and a half degrees on each side of the ecliptic, or seventeen in all. It is inclined to the equinoctial at an angle of about 23° 28', the points of intersection being reached by the sun, one at the vernal and the other at the autumnal equinox. The great circle of the zodiac was divided by the ancients into twelve equal portions called signs. They were named from the constellations then adjacent to them in the following order: Aries, the Ram; Taurus, the Bull; Gemini, the Twins; Cancer, the Crab; Leo, the Lion; Virgo, the Virgin; Libra, the Balance; Scorpio, the Scorpion; Sagittarius, the Archer; Capricornus, the Goat; Aquarius, the Water-bearer; and Pisces, the Fishes. The sun formerly entered Aries on March 20; now, owing to the precession of the equinoxes, the point of the heavens intersected by the celestial equator and the ecliptic, technically called the first point of Aries, has moved well into Pisces.

zō-dī'-a-cal, a. [Eng. zodiac; -al.] Of or pertaining to the zodiac.

"A philosophical explanation of the zodiacal system."—Watson: Hist. Eng. Poetry, vol. iii.

zodiacal-constellations, s. pl.

Astron.: The twelve constellations from which the signs of the zodiac are named.

Astron.: A pearly glow spreading over a portion of the sky near the point at which the sun is just about to rise in the morning or has just set in the evening. It extends from the horizon a considerable distance towards the zenith, and is best seen in the tropics in spring evenings about the time of the vernal equinox. In the latitude of London it is seen chiefly in the western part of the sky in early spring after the evening twilight, and at the close of autumn before daybreak in the eastern horizon. The generally accepted theory of the zodiacal light is that it consists of a continuous disc, whether of meteors or any other substance, in which the sun is central.

zō-ō, s. [Gr. ζῷον (zōō) = life.]

Zool.: A pseudo-genus of Crustacea, founded on the larvæ of some of the higher forms. There is a cephalo-thoracic shield, often provided with long spiniform processes, the middle of which project upwards from the middle of the back; the tail region is developed, but without appendages; lateral eyes are present in addition to the median eyes.

zoca-stage, s.

Zool.: The earliest stage in the development of the higher Crustacea.

zōc'h'-litz-ite (initial z as tz), s. [After Zöcblitz, Saxony, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A light yellow massive mineral occurring in serpentine. A hydrated silicate of magnesia; probably an impure talc.

zō-ō-prāx'-ī-scōpē, s. [Gr. ζῷον (zōō) = life; πράξις (praxis) = action, exercise, and σκοπεῖν (skopeō) = to see.] A zoogyroscope (q.v.).

zō-ō-trōpē, s. [Gr. ζῷον (zōō) = life, and τροπή (trōpē) = a turning.] A mechanical toy depending, like the thaumatrope, for its interest upon the constancy of visual impressions. It consists of a rotating drum, open at the top, in which, around its inner periphery, are placed strips of paper having figures of men, animals, &c. in varying positions. By turning the cylinder the images are seen through slots in its upper side, giving the effect of action to the figures. For instance, a clown jumping through a hoop is represented in perhaps a dozen different positions. The turning of the drum brings into view, in rapid succession, these varying positions until they blend into a perfect image full of motion, and operating to simulate natural action. A man sawing wood, an animal kicking, an acrobat playing with clubs, may be thus shown in apparent motion.

zō-har, s. [Heb. צוהר (zochhar) = whiteness, splendour.]

Hebrew Literature: A cabalistic commentary on the Old Testament.

* zō-ī-lō'-an, a. [See def.] Pertaining or relating to Zöllus, a severe critic and grammarian of Amphipolis, who severely criticised Homer, Plato, and Socrates; hence, applied to bitter, severe, or malignant criticism or critics.

* zō-ī-lism, s. [ZOLLISM.] Illiberal or carping criticism; unjust censure.

¶ Jennings (Curiosities of Criticism, 1831, p. 33) credits Tupper with having coined this word. It is, in reality, much older.

"Bring candid eyes unto the perusal of man's works, and let not zealism or detraction blast well-tended labours."—Brown: Christian Morals, pt. II, § 2.

zō-ī-ō-din, s. [Pref. zō-, and Gr. ἰώδης (iōdēs) = violet-like.] [IODINE.]

Chem.: Bonjean's name for the violet-coloured substance deposited from the water which drips from glistening, taken out of sulphurous springs.

zō-ī-ō-ite, s. [After Baron von Zois; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral, formerly regarded as a variety of epidote, but now shown to be a distinct species. Hardness, 6 to 6.5; sp. gr., 8.11 to 8.33; lustre, pearly on cleavage faces, vitreous elsewhere; colour, shade of gray, apple-green, peach-blossom to rose-red. Compos.: silica, 39.9; alumina, 22.8; lime, 37.3 = 100, whence the formula 2(CaO + 1/2 Al₂O₃) 3SiO₂. Dana divides as follows: A. Lime-zoisite, (1) ordinary, colours gray to white and brown, (2) rose-red or thallite; B. Lime-soda-zoisite, which includes Saussurite in part.

zō-kor, s. [Native name.]

Zool.: Siphneus aspalax, a mole-rat from the Altai mountains. It lives in subterranean runs like those of the mole, but of much greater extent.

zō-lā-ism, s. [From Emile Zola, a French novelist (born 1840), whose writings chiefly consist of intensely naturalistic descriptions of profligacy and low life.] Excessive naturalism; literature dealing exclusively, or almost exclusively, with the worst side of human nature.

"I have had in view a particular form of Zolaism much in vogue at this moment."—Athenæum, Dec. 30, 1882, p. 875.

zō-lā-ist'-ic, a. [ZOLAISM.] Excessively naturalistic; employing or delighting in excessive naturalism.

"How could he then find comfort in Zolaistic France?"—Athenæum, Jan. 30, 1885, p. 160.

Zöll'-vēr-ein (z as dz), s. [Ger. zoll = toll, duty, and verein = union or association.]

1. The German commercial or customs union, founded originally in 1827, but extended greatly after the war of 1866, when, owing to political considerations, Prussia obtained a preponderating influence in the union, which included the North German Bund, Bavaria, Württemberg, Baden, Hesse, and Luxemburg. This arrangement was brought prematurely to an end by the formation of the German Empire. By article 33 of the constitution of the Empire, the territory of the Zollverein coincides with the territories of the Empire, with the exceptions of the free ports of Hamburg, Altona, Bremen, Bremerhaven, Geestemünde, and Brahe, and some communes of the Grand-duchy of Baden, while Luxemburg and the Austrian canton of Jungholz are included in it. Its object is the regulation of a uniform rate of customs duties throughout the various states comprised in the union. The free ports were included in the Zollverein in October, 1883.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwī; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; gō, gem; thin, thīs; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -cious, -tious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

2. Hence, any commercial or customs union. "The Republics of Central and South America, Hayti, San Domingo, and the Brazilian Empire have decided to send delegates to Washington to promote an American Zollverein to the exclusion of the goods of other countries."—St. James's Gazette, May 19, 1868.

zōm-bō-ruk, s. [ZUMBOORUK.]

zō-mī-din, s. [Gr. ζῶμις (zōmīs) = broth; εἶδος (eidos) = resemblance, and Eng. suff. -in.] Chem.: Berzelius' name for that portion of the extract of meat which is insoluble in alcohol

zō-na, s. [Lat., from Gr. ζώνη (zōnē) = a girdle, from ζώνωμι (zōnwōmi) = to gird.]

- 1. Anat.: (See the compound).
- 2. Pathol.: A name for Shingles (q.v.).

zona-pellucida, s. [VITELLINE-MEMBRANA.]

zōn-al, a. [Eng. zon(e); -al.] Having the character of a zone, belt, or stripe.

zonal-pelargoniums, s. pl.

Bot.: Pelargoniums which have on their leaves zones of one or more colours differing from the ground colours.

zōn-ar, zōn-nar, s. [Gr. ζωνάριον (zōnárion), dimin. from ζώνη (zōnē) = a zone (q.v.).] A belt or girdle which native Christians and Jews in the East were obliged to wear, to distinguish them from the Muhammdans.

zō-nār-i-a, s. [Fem. sing. of Lat. zonarius = pertaining to a belt or girdle.]

Bot.: A genus of Fucaeae, akin to Padina (q.v.), but not marked with concentric lines. The species occur chiefly in warm countries; only one or two are British.

zō-nār-ŷ, a. [Lat. zonarius = of or pertaining to a belt or girdle.]

Zool.: Of or pertaining to that form of deciduous placenta in which the villi are arranged in a belt. (Huxley.)

zō-nāto, a. [Eng. zon(e); -ate.]

Bot.: Marked with zones or concentric bands of colour. Akin to ocellated, but with the concentric bands more numerous.

zōne, s. [Fr., from Lat. zona (q.v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. A girdle, a belt. (Milton: P. L., v. 280.)

2. Any well-marked band or stripe running round an object.

* 3. Circuit, circumference. (Milton: P. L., v. 558.)

II. Technically:

1. Anat.: A region of the body formed by imaginary lines drawn around it transversely. Used spec. of the abdominal zones or regions.

2. Biology:

(1) A stripe or belt, as of colour, on a plant, a shell, &c.

(2) A certain stratum of sea-water, the depth of the upper and under surfaces of which are generally measured or calculated in fathoms. There are five zones to mark the bathymetric distribution of marine animals. Some of them are named from the distribution of sea-plants, which also they mark:

The Littoral Zone, between tide marks.
The Laminarian Zone, from low water to fifteen fathoms.

The Coralline Zone, from fifteen to fifty fathoms.
The Deep-sea Coral Zone, fifty to a hundred fathoms.
The Abyssal Zone, beyond a hundred fathoms.

3. Geog.: One of five imaginary belts surrounding the earth. They are the North Frigid Zone, between the North Pole and the Arctic Circle; the North Temperate Zone, between the Arctic Circle and the Tropic of Cancer; the Torrid Zone, between the Tropic of Cancer and the Tropic of Capricorn; the South Temperate Zone, between the Tropic of Capricorn and the Antarctic Circle; and the South Frigid Zone, between the Antarctic Circle and the South Pole.

South Frigid Zone, between the Antarctic Circle and the South Pole.

4. Geol. (Pl.): Particular beds in the stages or divisions of certain geological formations. [AMMONITE, PRIMORDIAL-ZONE.]

5. Math.: The portion of the surface of a sphere included between two parallel planes.

- (1) Annual zone: [ANNUAL, II. S. (5)].
- (2)iliary zone: [ILIARY ZONE].
- (3) Isothermal zone: [ISOTHERMAL].

* zōne, v.t. [ZONE, s.] To encircle with, or as with a zona (q.v.).

"His embrace Had zoned her through the night." Keats: Endymion, II. 460.

zōned, a. [Eng. zon(e); -ed.]

* 1. Having a girdle or belt; wearing a girdle or belt.

2. Having zones or bands resembling zones, striped; in botany the same as ZONATE (q.v.). "She brought me Academic silks, in hue The lilac, with a silken hood to each And zoned with gold." Tennyson: Princess, II. 4

* zōne-less, a. [Eng. zone; -less.] Destitute of a zone or girdle; ungirded.

"In careless folds loose fell her zoneless vest." Mason: Iola.

* zōn-ic, s. [Eng. zone; -ic.] A zona, a girdle, a belt.

"The place where I was bred stands upon a zone of coal." Smollett: Travels, let. iv.

zōn-nar, s. [ZONAR.]

zō-nō-chlōr-ite, s. [Eng. zon(e); o connect., and chlorite.]

Min.: The same as CHLORASTROLITE (q.v.).

zō-nō-trich-ŷ-a, s. [Gr. ζώνη (zōnē) = a girdle, and τριχίας (trichias) = one that is hairy.]

Ornith.: A genus of Fringillidæ, with nine species, ranging over the whole Nearctic and Neotropical regions. Beak slightly conical, upper mandible straight and somewhat pointed; wings moderate, reaching as far as upper tail-coverts; tarsus high, toes long.

zō-nū-lā, s. [Lat. = a little girdle; dimin. from zona (q.v.).]

Anat.: A small zone; as, the Zonula of Zinn, the anterior portion of the hyaloid membrana which is firmer and more fibrous than the rest. Called also the Suspensory Ligament of the Lens. (Quain.)

zō-nū-lar, a. [Eng. zonul(e); -ar.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Of or relating to a zone; zone-shaped.

2. Zool.: Of or pertaining to that form of non-deciduous placenta in which the fetal villi are arranged in a comparatively broad band. (Glossary to Huxley's Class. of Animals.)

zō-nūle, s. [A dimin. from zone (q.v.).] A little zone, band, or belt.

* zō-nū-lēt, s. [A double dimin. from zone = zone-ule-let.] A little zone or belt; a zonule.

"So smiles that riband 'bout my Julia's waist; Or like-nay, 'tis that zonule of love." Herrick: Upon Julia's Ribbon.

zō-nūr-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zonu(ri)us; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of Brevilinguia (q.v.) with fifteen genera containing fifty-two species. Their distribution is remarkable; more than half the family come from South Africa, others are from Madagascar, America (from Mexico to British Columbia), and three of the genera form a distinct sub-group—the Glass Snakes—from North Africa, North America, the south-east of Europe, and the Khasya Hills. The family contains forms which have the shape of lizards, and others which are serpentine. Head pyramidal or depressed; body covered with scales in cross bands; sides with distinct longitudinal fold; limbs four, strong, entirely wanting, or concealed beneath the skin; ears distinct, eyelids present.

zō-nūr-ŷ, s. [Gr. ζώνη (zōnē) = a belt, and οὐρά (oura) = the tail.]

Zool.: The type-genus of Zonuridæ (q.v.), with several species, from the south and east of Africa and Madagascar.

zō-ō, s. [Gr. ζῶον (zōon) = a living creature, an animal.] A common prefix in compounds of Greek origin, signifying animal, as zoology zoophyte, zoospore, &c.

zōō, s. Originally the abbreviated name of the London (Eng.) Zoological Gardens; now applied to any zoological garden.

zō-ō-cāp-sa, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Lat. capsa = a repository, chest, or box.]

Palæont.: The oldest known genus of Ba-lanidae. It is from the Liás.

zō-ō-carp, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. καρπός (karpós) = fruit.]

Bot.: A zoospore (q.v.).

zō-ō-cāu-lōn, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. καυλός (kaulós) = a stalk, a stem.]

Bot.: An erect, branching, tentaculiferous colony-stock, as in the genus Dendrozoona (q.v.).

zō-ō-chēm-ŷo-al, a. [Pref. zoo-, and Eng. chemical.] Of or pertaining to zoochemistry (q.v.).

"The application of zochemical facts to the elucidation of processes taking place in the system."—Frey: Histology of Man (tr. Barker), p. 6.

zō-ō-chēm-ŷs-trŷ, * zō-ōch-ŷ-mŷ, s. [Eng. zoo-, and Eng. chemistry.]

Nat. Science: (See extract.)

"Study of the nature of the substances occurring in the animal economy—their properties, constitution, transformation, &c.—constitutes what is termed zochemistry."—Frey: Histology of Man (tr. Barker), p. 6.

zō-ōch-ŷ-mŷ, s. [ZOOCHEMISTRY.]

zō-ō-çŷt-ŷ-ŷm (pl. zō-ō-çŷt-ŷ-a), s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. κύτος (kutos) = a cell.]

Bot.: The gelatinous matrix excreted and inhabited by various colonial Infusoria—e.g., Ophrydium, Phalansterium, &c.

zō-ō-dēn-dri-ŷm (pl. zō-ō-dēn-dri-ŷ), s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. δένδρον (dendron) = a tree.]

Bot.: The tree-like colony-stock of such Infusoria as Dendromonas and Eplatylis.

zō-ō-çŷ-ŷm (pl. zō-ō-çŷ-a), s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. οἶκος (oikos) = a dwelling.]

Bot.: One of the cells or chambers inhabited by the polypide of a Polyzoon. In the Common Sea-mat (Flustra foliacea) of the

A. Flustra foliacea. B. A portion of the colony magnified to show the Zoecia.

British coast the zoecia may be made out with the naked eye, and are very clearly seen with a lens of moderate power.

zō-ō-gēn, zō-ō-gēne, s. [Gr. ζωγενής (zōgēnēs) = born of an animal; pref. zoo-, and Gr. γεννάω (gennao) = to produce.]

Chem.: The same as ZOIODIN (q.v.).

zō-ō-gēn-ŷo-al, [Eng. zoogen(y); -ic.] Of or pertaining to animal production.

zō-ō-gēn-ŷ, zō-ō-gēn-ŷ, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. γένεσις, γόνη (genesis, gonē) = generation.]

Nat. Science: The doctrine of the formation of the organs of living beings.

zō-ō-gē-ō-grāph-ŷo-al, a. [Pref. zoo-, and Eng. geographical.] Of or pertaining to zoogeography (q.v.).

zō-ō-gē-ō-g-ŷ-ŷ-phŷ, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Eng. geography.]

Nat. Science: The study of the distribution of animals over the surface of the earth, their migrations, &c.

* zō-ō-glōe-a, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. γλοεά (glōeā) = glue.]

Bot.: A pseudo-genus of Schizomycetea, consisting of Bacteria when they have reached the stage of development at which they form gelatinous colonies. They attain continue to grow and divide, and may again become active.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sūre, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

zō-ōg-ra-phēr, s. [Eng. zoography(y); -er.] One who studies or practices zoography; or, who describes animals, their forms and habits.

"Upon inquiry we find no mention herof in ancient zoographers.—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. V, ch. 1.

zō-ō-grāph-īc, zō-ō-grāph-īo-al, a. [Eng. zoography(y); -īc, -īcal.] Of or pertaining to zoography, or the description of animals, their forms and habits.

zō-ōg-ra-phīst, s. [Eng. zoography(y); -īst.] One who describes or depicts animals; a zoographer; a zoologist.

zō-ōg-rāph-ŷ, s. [Gr. ζῳον (zōon) = an animal, and γραφή (graphē) = to describe, to write.] A description of animals, their forms and habits

"We are conducted to zoography, and the whole body of phisick.—Gianelli: Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. xxii.

zō-ō-gŷr-ō-soōpe, s. [Pref. zōo-, and Eng. gyroscope.] An amplification of the zoötrope (q.v.) in which a series of successive instantaneous photographs of an animal in motion are placed on a circular rotating glass, the photographa being alternately illuminated by an oxyhydrogen lantern, as the glass turns, throwing a single continuous, everchanging picture on a screen. Although the separate photographa show the successive positions of an animal in motion—for instance, a horse, in making a single stride—the zoogyroscope throws on the screen a vivid presentment of a moving animal.

zō-ō-īd, zō-ō-īd, s. & a. [Gr. ζῳον (zōon) = an animal, and εἶδος (eidōs) = resemblance.]

A. As substantive: Biol.: An animal organism not independently developed from a fertilized ovum, but derived from a preceding individual by the process of fission or gemmation. Specially applicable to the Infusoria and other Protozoa, and to the component members of all stock-building communities, such as Polypes, Corals, and Polyzoa.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to or resembling an animal.

zō-ō-ī-a-trŷ, s. [Pref. zōo-, and Gr. λατρεία (latreia) = worship.]

Compar. Relig.: Animal worship; adoration paid by man to any of the lower animals. This cultus seems to have passed through three stages: (1) The animal was revered and propitiated as possessing a power greater than that of man; (2) The animal was regarded as an incarnation of some deity or spirit; (3) It was raised to the position of a tribal ancestor. [Torem.] In the early history of the human race zoölatry of some kind was very prevalent. Traces of it appear in the Bible as in the story of the Golden Calf made by the Israelites (Exod. xxxii). Zoölatry took deep root in the religious life of the ancient Egyptians, and all three forms flourished among that people. Juvenal opens his fifteenth satire with a scathing invective of Egyptian zoölatry, and detailed accounts of it occur in Herodotus (ii.), Plutarch (de Iside et Osiride), Strabo (lib. xvii.), and Cicero (de Nat. Deor., iii. 15). In classic times the chief form of zoölatry was serpent-worship (q.v.), though traces of other forms occur in the transformation myths of the poets. In the present day zoölatry survives chiefly in India [VISHNU, HUNOONAM, ZĒSU], among the snake-worshippers of the west coast of Africa, and the Red Indians of North America.

"The three motives of animal-worship... viz. direct worship of the animal for itself, indirect worship of it as a fetish acted through by a deity, and veneration for it as a totem or representative of a tribe-ancestor, no doubt account in no small measure for the phenomena of zoölatry among the lower races, the allowance being also made for the effects of myth and symbolism, of which we may gain frequent glimpses.—Taylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1878), i. 237.

zō-ō-līte, s. [Pref. zōo-, and Gr. λίθος (lithos) = a stone.] A fossil animal substance.

zō-ō-l-ō-gŷr, s. [Eng. zoology(y); -er.] The same as ZOOLOGIST (q.v.).

"As the naturalist uses thus illustrate pathology as a chymist, so may he do the like as a zoöloger.—Boyle: Works, i. 54.

zō-ō-lōg-īo-al, a. [Eng. zoology(y); -īcal.] Of or pertaining to zoology or the science of animals.

zoological-garden, s. A public garden in which a collection of animals is kept. The gardens of the Zoological Society, Regent's Park, London, are probably the finest in the world. The chief zoological gardens are:

Table with columns: Paris (Jardin des Plantes), London, Dublin, Antwerp, Berlin, Brussels, Rotterdam, Melbourne, Frankfurt, Cologne, Paris (Jardin d'Acclimatation), Hamborg, Moscow, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Calcutta, Founded, 1794, 1793, 1830, 1843, 1844, 1851, 1857, 1857, 1858, 1860, 1860, 1860, 1864, 1874, 1875, 1875.

zoological-province, s. Zool.: A zoological-region.

zoological-region, s. Biol.: (REGION, s. 11. 2.)

Zoological Society, s. Societies: A society for the prosecution of zoological research; specif., the Zoological Society of London, founded in 1826 by a body of scientists, among whom Sir Stamford Raffles and Sir Humphrey Davy, Bart., were especially prominent, "for the advancement of Zoology and Animal Physiology, and for the introduction of new and curious subjects of the Animal Kingdom." Numerous societies have since been organized, in the cities of the United States and Europe, for inquiry into the characteristics and life history of animals. Zoological study is the leading feature of many of our prominent scientific institutions, such as the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia, the American Museum of Natural History, of New York, and various others, and less exclusively of the Smithsonian Institution of Washington. All these Societies and Institutions publish Proceedings or journals under other titles containing details of their work and original communications in zoology.

zō-ō-lōg-īo-al-ŷ, adv. [Eng. zoology(y); -ly.] In a zoological manner; according to the teachings or principles of zoology.

zō-ō-l-ō-gīst, s. [Eng. zoology(y); -īst.]

Physical Science: A person skilled in or devoted to zoology (q.v.). In modern usage the term is being replaced by biologist.

zō-ō-l-ō-gŷ, s. [Pref. zōo-, and Gr. λόγος (logos) = a discourse.]

Natural Science: The study of living animals, a branch of Biology, which also includes Botany though it is impossible accurately to define the limits of these two branches, some organisms, low in the scale of life, being sometimes claimed as animals and sometimes as plants. Zoology covers a large ground, which becomes larger with the growth of the science. The chief branches of Zoology are: (1) Morphology, dealing with form and structure; (2) Comparative Anatomy, which investigates the position and relation of organs and parts (and, as this must be the foundation of scientific classification, the term Comparative Anatomy is often used as synonymous with the older term Zoology); (3) Embryology, dealing with development from the ovum to maturity; (4) Physiology (q.v.), which treats of the organs of nutrition, reproduction, and the nervous system; (5) Classification or Taxonomy, which classifies animals into natural groups; (6) Zoogeography (q.v.); and (7) Descent of the individual (Ontogenesis) and of the phylum (Phylogenesis). From the earliest times man was accustomed to study and observe the lower animals. Solomon's description of the ant (Prov. vi. 6-8) is justified by the scientific observation of the nineteenth century; Job (xxxix. 14) knew the peculiar method of incubation adopted by the ostrich; and Jeremiah (Lam. iv. 3) speaks in unmistakable terms of marine mammals. Aristotle and Pliny have recorded many zoological facts, and nearly as many legends; but from that time down to the days of Ray and Willughby there was scarcely any attempt at scientific classification, nor was it till the eighteenth century that anything like a comprehensive scheme was put forth in the Systema Naturæ of Linneus, who divided the Animal Kingdom into six classes: Mammalia, Aves, Pisces, Amphibia, Insecta, and Vermes, these classes being divided into orders, and these again into genera, without any intermediate division. In the light of the present day this scheme is seen to be erroneous, but it formed a rough outline, which served as a guide to future inquirers. Cuvier's classification came next, with four sub-kingdoms: Vertebrata, Mollusca, Articulata, and Radiata. Agassiz adopted these main divisions, but arranged his classes somewhat differently. The classification of Owen in his Comparative Anatomy of Invertebrates (ed. 2nd, p. 16) was:

Table with columns: SUB-KINGDOM, DIVISIONS, VERTEBRATA, PISCES, AVES, REPTILIA, MAMMALIA, MOLLUSCA, TUNICATA, BRACHIOPODA, LAMELLIBRANCHIATA, PTEROPODA, CEPHALOPODA, ARTICULATA, CIRRIPODA, ANELLATA, EPIDORA, CRUSTACEA, INSECTA, ARACHNIDA, RADIATA, ROTIFERA, RHIZOPODA, POLYSCALARIA, ENTROZOA, COELENTERATA, TUBELLARIA, STERELMINTHA, RADIARIA, ECHINODERMATA, BRYOZOA, ANTHOZOA, ACALAPHA, HYDROZOA.

Huxley (Introd. to Class. of Animals, 1869) adopted the following:

Table with columns: SUB-KINGDOM, DIVISIONS, PROTOZOA, RHIZOPODA, GREGARINA, RADIOLARIA, SPONGIDA, INFUSORIA, HYDROZOA, ACTINOZOA, COELENTERATA, SCYLLIDIA, ECHINODERMATA, ANELLIDIA, CRUSTACEA, ARACHNIDA, MYRIAPODA, INSECTA, CHELOGNATHA, ANELLIDA, POLYPODA, BRACHIOPODA, TUNICATA, LAMELLIBRANCHIATA, BRACHIOGASTROPODA, PALMOGASTROPODA, PTEROPODA, CEPHALOPODA, VERTEBRATA, PISCES, AMPHIBIA, REPTILIA, AVES, MAMMALIA.

Last and chief in importance is the classification of Gegenbaur, of which Ray Lankester says (in his preface to Gegenbaur's Elements of Comp. Anat., ed. Bell), that "at the present day, naturalists have learnt to recognise in their efforts after what was vaguely called the 'natural' system of classification, an unconscious attempt to construct the pedigree of the animal world. The attempt has now become a conscious one. Necessarily classifications which aim at exhibiting the pedigree vary from year to year with the increase in our knowledge. They also vary according to the importance attached by their authors to one or another class of facts as demonstrating blood-relationship."

Table with columns: PHYLUM, DIVISIONS, 1. PROTOZOA, RHIZOPODA, GREGARINA, IUTUSORIA, 1. COELENTERATA, (1) SPONGIDA, (2) ACALAPHA, 2. VERMES, PLATHELMINTHES, NEMATHELMINTHES, CHELOGNATHI, ACANTHOCEPHALI, BRYOZOA, ROTATORIA, ENTROZOUATI, Gephyrea, ANNULATA, ARTERIDA, CRIOIDA, ECHINOIDA, HOLOTHUROIDA, 4. ARTHROPODA, CRUSTACEA, POSELOPODA, ARACHNIDA, MYRIAPODA, INSECTA, 7. MOLLUSCA, LAMELLIBRANCHIATA, SCAPHOPODA, GASTROPODA, PTEROPODA, CEPHALOPODA, 8. TUNICATA, 9. VERTEBRATA, (1) ACTINOIDA, (2) CRACIOIDA, Leptocondyli, (a) Cyclostomata (Myxinoidea, Petromyzontes), (b) Gnathostomata, (1.) Anamniota (Pisces, Amphibia), (2.) Amniota (Sauropsida, Mammalia).

zō-ō-mēl-an-in, s. [Pref. zōo-, and Eng. melanin.]

Chem.: Bogdanow's name for the black pigment of birds' feathers. It is slightly soluble in water, but dissolves readily in potash and ammonia.

zō-ō-mor-phīc, a. [Pref. zōo-, and Gr. μόρφη (morphē) = shape, form.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Pertaining to or exhibiting animal forms.

"That peculiarly Celtic form of interlacing zoomorphic decoration, united with coloured designs of diverging spirals and trumpet scrolls."—Jos. Anderson. (Annandale.)

2. Anthrop.: Representing a god or other supernatural being under the form of one of the lower animals. The zoomorphic element in Classic mythology appears in such cases as that of the Smithsonian Apollo, and the metamorphoses of Jupiter; it is very strongly marked in the religion of ancient Egypt [ZOO-LATRY], and traces of it may be found among the Jews and in the poetic imagery of the Apocalypse. (Gen. iii. 24; Exod. xv. 18; Ezek. x. 14, xi. 18; Exod. xxxiii.; Rev. iv. 6, 8, 9; v. 6, 14; i. 6; vii. 11; xiv. 3; xv. 7; xix. 4.)

"The facts of savage animal-worship, and their relations to totemism, seem still unknown to or unappreciated by scholars, with the exception of Mr. Sayce, who recognises totemism as the origin of the zoomorphic element in Egyptian religion."—A. Lang: Custom & Myth, p. 115.

zō-ō-morph-ism, s. [ZOO-MORPHIC.]

1. The state or condition of being zoomorphic; characteristic exhibition of the forms of the lower animals, as distinct from man.

"That zoomorphism of ornamentation which in this case is only partially present."—Jos. Anderson. (Annandale.)

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwī; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, hençh; go, çem; thin, çhis; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exīst. ph = f -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -ston = shūn; -çion, -çion = zhūn. -çious, -çious, -çious = shūš. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

2. The transformation of men into beasts. (Smart.)

zō-ōn, s. [Gr. ζῷον (zōon) = an animal.] Biol.: The product of a fertilized ovum.

"It is urged that whether the development of the fertilized germ be continuous or discontinuous is a matter of secondary importance; that the totality of living tissue to which the fertilized germ gives rise in any one case is the equivalent of the totality to which it gives rise in any other case; and that we must recognize this equivalence, whether such totality of living tissue takes a concrete or a discrete arrangement. In pursuance of this view a zoological individual is constituted either by any such single animal as a mammal or bird, which may properly claim the title of a zoon, or by any such group of animals as the numerous Medusae that have been developed from the same egg, which are to be severally distinguished as zooids. — Herbert Spencer: Prin. Biol., § 74.

zō-ōn'yo, a. [Eng. zoon; -ic.] Derived from or contained in animal substances.

zoonic-acid, s.

Chem.: Berthollet's name for the impure acetic acid, obtained by the dry distillation of animal substances.

zō-ōn'ite, s. [ZOONITES.]

Zoology:

1. Gen.: One of the theoretic transverse divisions of any segmented animal.

2. Spec.: One of the segments of an articulated animal.

*zō-ō-nī-tēs, s. [ZOON.]

Biol.: A term proposed as an equivalent of zooid (q.v.).

"In order to confine the term individual to such cases [the direct product of the germ-cell and spermatid] it has been proposed among animals to give the term zoid or zooid to the independent structures which result from sprouting, gemination, or fission." — Eng. Cyclop. (Zool.), iv. 581. (Note.)

zō-ōn'ō-mŷ, zō-ō-nō-mī-ga, s. [Pref. zoon, and Gr. νόμος (nomos) = a law.] The laws of animal life, or the science which treats of the phenomena of animal life, their causes and relations.

zō-ōph'-a-ga, s. pl. [Gr. ζωοφάγος (zoo-phagos) = living on animal food; carnivorous.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: An old popular name for the larger and fiercer carnivora. It has no scientific value.

2. Zool.: Oegenbauer's name for a group of Marsupials equivalent to Owen's Sarcophaga (q.v.).

†zō-ōph'-a-gan, s. [ZOOPHAGA.] One of the zoophaga; a sarcophagan.

†zō-ōph'-a-gōus, a. [Mod. Lat. zoophilus(a); Eng. adj. suff. -ous.] Devouring or feeding on animals; sarcophagous.

"The zoophilous marsupials already cited." — Owen: Brit. Fossil Mammals, p. 65.

*zō-ōph'-ī-list, s. [Pref. zoon; Gr. φιλέω (philēō) = to love, and Eng. suff. -ist.] A lover of animals, or of anything living; one whose sympathy embraces all living creation.

"Our philosopher and zoophilist." — Southey: Doctor, ch. cexxviii.

†zō-ōph'-ī-lōus, a. [Pref. zoon, and Gr. φιλέω (philēō) = to love.]

Nat. Science: (See extract.)

"The most interesting article in the number [Vivona o Giornale Botanico Italiano] for July is by Sig. A. Piccone, on the plants growing wild in Liguria which he terms 'zoophilous' or 'ornithophilous,' i.e., those which are absolutely dependent for the germination of their seeds on the fruit being swallowed by birds." — Nature, Aug. 28, 1886, p. 403.

zō-ōph'-ī-lŷ, s. [ZOOPHILIST.] A love of animals; a sympathy or tender care for living creatures, which prevents all unnecessary acts of cruelty or destruction.

*zō-ō-phite, s. [ZOOPHYTE.]

zō-ō-phōr'io, a. [Eog. zoophor(ia); -ic.] Bearing or supporting an animal: as, a zoophoric column, that is, one supporting the figure of an animal.

*zō-ōph'-ōr-ūs, s. [Gr. ζωόφορος (zoo-phoros).] Anc. Arch.: A part between the architrave and cornice: the same as the frieze in modern architecture; so called from the figures of animals carved on it. [ZOOPHORIC.]

†zō-ō-phŷ-ta, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. ζωοφυτον (zoo-phuton) = an animal-plant. (Arist. Hist. Anim., xviii. 1-6.)]

Zool.: A term borrowed from Aristotle by Cuvier, and used by him as a synonym of Radiata (q.v.). The term has no longer any scientific value, but is often loosely applied as a designation for many plant-like animals, as sponges, corals, &c., more or less resembling plants in appearance. "When the term began to be used by naturalists, it designated a miscellaneous class of beings, which were believed to occupy the space between the animal and vegetable kingdoms, and in which the characteristics of the subjects of each met and were intermingled." (Encyc. Brit., ed. 8th.)

zō-ō-phŷte, s. [ZOOPHYTA.] Any individual of Olivier's Radiata (q.v.); an animal of extremely low organization, presenting many external resemblances to a plant.

"The second step Nature takes is from plants to Plant-animals, zoophytes. 'There are many marine creatures,' he [Aristotle] says, 'which leave the observer in doubt as to whether they are plants or animals, for they grow on the rocks, and many die if detached.'" — G. H. Lewis: Aristotle, p. 192.

zoophyte-trough, s. A live-box (q.v.).

zō-ō-phŷt'ic, zō-ō-phŷt'io-al, a. [Eng. zoophyte(-ic); -ic, -ical.] Pertaining or relating to zoophytes.

zō-ōph'-ŷ-tōid, a. [Eng. zoophyte(-ic); suff. -oid.] Like or resembling a zoophyte.

zō-ō-phŷ-tē-lōg'ic-al, a. [Eng. zoophytology(-y); -ic(-al).] Pertaining or relating to zoophytology.

zō-ō-phŷ-tōl'ō-gŷ, s. [Eng. zoophyte(-ic); -ology.] The natural history of zoophytes.

*zō-ō-phŷ-tōn, s. [Gr.] A zoophyte (q.v.). "A zoophyton may be rightly said to have a middle excellency between an animal and a plant." — Henry More: Mystery of Iniquity, p. 27.

†zō-ō-spērm, s. [Pref. zoon, and Eng. sperm.] Zool.: A Spermatozoon (q.v.).

zō-ō-spō-rān-gŷ-ūm (pl. zō-ō-spō-rān-gŷ-a), s. [Pref. zoon, and Mod. Lat. sporangium (q.v.).] Zool.: The cell in which a zoospore is formed or becomes encysted.

zō-ō-spōre, s. [ZOOSPOREÆ.]

Bol. (Pl.): Reproductive bodies of certain Algae of low organization [PROTOPHYTA], as many Coniferæ (q.v.). They have ciliated processes, which enable them to swim about, and from this animal-like locomotion are with difficulty separated from the infusorial animalcules. Each zoospore when set free from the tough coat in which it is for a time encysted is capable of living independently.

zō-ō-spōr'ō-ēs, s. pl. [Pref. zo; Gr. σπορά (spora), σπόρος (sporos) = . . . a seed, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eae.]

Bol.: A primary group of Algae, proposed by Thuret to contain those species which are propagated by zoospores. He divides it into: (1) Chlorosporeæ, colour usually green; (2) Pheosporeæ, colour brown or olive.

zō-ō-spōr'ic, a. [Eng. zoospore(-ic); -ic.] Pertaining to or having the character of zoospores.

zō-ō-stē-ār'ic, a. [Pref. zoon, and Eng. stearic.] Containing fat and derived from animal substances.

zoostearic-acid, s.

Chem.: Landerer's name for a fatty acid, obtained from the bones of fossil mammalia, and crystallizing from alcohol in laminae. (Watts.)

zō-ō-teir'a, s. [Pref. zoon, and Gr. τεῖρος (teiros) = a constellation.]

Zool.: A genus of Radiolaria. No siliceous skeleton, but contracted pointed filaments elevated on a pedicle and not contractile.

zō-ō-thām-nī-ūm, s. [Pref. zoon, and Gr. θάμνος (thamnos) = a copse, a thicket.]

Zool.: A genus of Peritrichous Infusoria, from salt and fresh water. Animalcules structurally identical with those of Vorticella (q.v.), ovate, pyriform, or globular, often dissimilar in shape, and of two sizes, stationed at the extremities of a branching, highly contractile pedicle, the internal muscle of which is continuous throughout. There are several species, divided into two groups according as the zooids of the same colony resemble or differ from each other.

zō-ō-thē'ca, s. [Pref. zoon, and Gr. θήκη (thēkē) = a case.] Anat. & Physiol.: A cell containing a spermatozoid.

zō-ō-thē'qŷ-ūm (pl. zō-ō-thē'qŷ-a), s. [ZOOTHESCA.]

Biol.: Any compound tubular structure excreted and inhabited by Infusoria like Rhizopodendron.

zō-ō-thō'mē, s. [Pref. zoon, and Gr. θάμνος (thāmos) = a heap.] Zool.: A Zoethecium (q.v.).

zō-ōt'yo, a. [Gr. ζῷον (zōon) = an animal.] Containing the remains of organic life. (Said of rocks, coal, caves, &c.)

zootic-acid, s. [HYDROCYANIC-ACID.]

zō-ōt'ō-ca, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. ζωοτικός (zōotikos) = producing its young alive. (Arist. H.A., i. 25.)]

Zool.: A genus of Lacertidae, with eight species, from Central and Southern Europe, Madeira, South Africa, and Australia. One, Zootoca vivipara, the Viviparous Lizard (q.v.), is British. Sometimes made a sub-genus of Lacerta, from which it is distinguished by having the posterior nasal shield single.

zō-ō-tōm'ic-al, a. [Eng. zootomy(-y); -ical.] Of or pertaining to zootomy.

zō-ōt'ō-mist, s. [ZOOTOMY.] One who dissects the bodies of the lower animals; a comparative anatomist.

zō-ōt'ō-mŷ, s. [Pref. zoon, and Gr. τομή (tomē) = a cutting.]

Nat. Science: The dissection of the lower animals. "The comparative anatomy of animals is sometimes called zootomy." — St. George Meier: The Cat, ch. 1, § 4.

zō-ōx-ān'thin, s. [Pref. zoon, and Eng. xanthin.]

Chem.: A dark-red powder, extracted from the red feathers of Cathartes auriceps, by repeated treatment with hot alcohol.

zōō'-zōō, s. [Onomatopoeitic.] A wood-pigeon. (Prov.)

zōph'-ōr-ūs, s. [ZOOPHORUS.]

zō-pŷ-lō'tē, s. [Sp.] [URUBU.]

zō-pŷ-sa, s. [Lat., from Gr. ζώπυσα (zō-pyssa).] (See def.)

Pathol.: A mixture of pitch and tar impregnated with salt-water, scraped from the hulls of ships. It was formerly used as an external application, being believed to be resolutive and desiccative. (Simmonds.)

zorg'ite, s. [After Zorge, Hartz, where first found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A massive granular mineral, occurring with many other species in the metaliferous lodes of the Hartz. Hardness, 2½; sp. gr. 7 to 7½; lustre, metallic; colour, lead-gray, sometimes with a yellowish tawny. Compos.: a selenide of lead and copper.

zō-ril'la, †zōr'ille, s. [Sp. zorilla = the whelp of a fox, from zorro = a fox.]

Zool.: Ictonyx zorilla, a Viverrine Mammal, possessing feid scent glands, allied to the Skunks and Badgers, extending over Africa and into Asia Minor. Snout elongated, body stout, tail bushy; total length about twenty inches: colour shining black, marked with white spots and bands.

ZORILLA.

zor-ni-a, s. [Named after John Zorn, a Bavarian botanical author (1739-90).]

Bol.: A genus of Hedyosarææ. Herbaceous plants with pinnate leaves, having two or fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ. œ = ē: ey = ā; qu = kw.

four leaflets and papilionaceous flowers, in spikes or solitary. Known species about ten, mostly from America. Zornia diphylla is used as horse feed and by the Foulahs.

Zōr-ō-as-trī-an, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Zoroaster or Zoroastres, the classical name of an illustrious personage called in Persian Zartusht, Zaratust, or Zardusht, and in Zend Zarathustra, founder or reformer of the Parsee religion. He is generally said to have been born in 589, at Urmia, a town of Azerbaijan, and died a.c. 539. But other dates have been assigned, and there may have been more than one Zoroaster. [ZOROASTRIANISM.]

B. As subst.: A follower of Zoroaster, a professor of Zoroastrianism (q.v.).

zōr-ō-as-trī-an-igm, s. [Eng. zoroastrian; -ism.]

Compar. Relig.: The religious system said to have been taught by Zoroaster, by which term Dr. Haug understands a series of religious teachers rather than a single person bearing the name. The old Persians and the Brahmins continued one people after they had separated from the primitive Aryan stock, their faith being Nature-worship. For the subsequent religious schism between them see BRAHMANISM. The first Zoroaster, if there was more than one, is believed by Dr. Haug to have lived as early as Moaes, or, at least, not later than Solonon. He was the reformer rather than the originator of the faith called after his name. The Zoroastrian sacred book is the Zend Avesta (q.v.). The creed founded on it was professed by the old Persians, as it is by their successors the modern Parsees, sometimes called Fire-worshippers. It teaches that there has always existed a certain entity, whose name, Zardāna Akarana, has been translated "Time without bounds." This entity is represented as having simultaneously brought into existence two exceedingly powerful beings: one, Hormuzd, the creator and patron of all good; the other, Ahriman, the author and supporter of all evil. Hormuzd created light, and Ahriman darkness. The two beings are in perpetual conflict; and each has under him a hierarchy of angels. This system is denounced in Isaiah xlv. 5-7. With it another creed—that of fire-worship—possibly derived through the Magi from the Tursians, became commingled; there is allusion to it in Ezekiel viii. 16-18. Both beliefs go to constitute the modern Parsee faith. Professor Ilang believes that the teaching of the primitive Zoroaster was misunderstood, and that it was much purer than the system of doctrine which has long passed current in his name. [FIRE-WORSHIPPER, GUESRE, PARSEE.]

zōg-mā, s. [Corrupt. Arabic.]

Astron.: A fixed star of magnitude 2. Called also δ Leonis.

zōs-tēr, s. [Lat. = shingles, from Gr. ζωστήρ (zōstēr) = a girdle.]

Pathol.: [SHINGLES.]

zōs-tēr-ā, s. [Gr. ζωστήρ (zōstēr) = a girdle.]

1. Bot.: Grass-wrack; the typical genus of Zosteraceæ (q.v.), which is sometimes reduced to a tribe of Naiadaceæ. The species are grass-like marine plants, with matted creeping rootstocks, long, linear, distichous sheathing leaves, a foliaceous spathe, and a linear, membranous spadix, with inconspicuous green flowers inserted in two rows on one of its sides. Anthers ovate, sessile, alternating with the ovate germs; style one; stigmas two, elongated, linear; fruit with one seed. Known species about two, both European. They are Zostera marina, the Broad-leaved, and Z.

1. Spadix. 2. Pistil. 3. Anther.

nana, the Dwarf Grass-wrack. The former has leaves one to three feet long and a many-flowered spadix, the latter has the leaves six inches long and a few-flowered spadix. They occur in muddy and sandy estuaries near low-water mark, the second being the rarer species. Z. marina is used largely in parts of Europe for packing small fancy articles for exportation, and for stuffing cushions.

2. Palæobot.: One species is found in the British Pleistocene.

zōs-tēr-ā-gē-se, s. pl. [Lat. zoster(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æce.]

Bot.: Sea-wracks; an order of Endogens, alliance Hydralæa. Marine plants living among seaweeds, and resembling them in appearance. Leaves thin, grassy, sheathing at the base; flowers very minute, naked, or surrounded by three scales situated within herbaceous spathes. Anthers definite in number, sessile, one or two-celled; stigmas one or two, capillary; ovary free, one-celled; ovule one; fruit drupaceous, one-celled, with a single pendulous seed. Found chiefly at the bottom of the ocean, though occasionally on the shore, especially in the Eastern hemisphere. Known genera five, species twelve. (Kunth & Lindley.)

zōs-tēr-ite, s. [Mod. Lat. zosteria; suff. -ite.]

A fossil zostera, or some allied species of plant.

zōs-tēr-ōps, s. [Gr. ζωστήρ (zōstēr) = a girdle, and ὄψ (ōps) = the eye. Named from a well-defined circle of light-coloured feathers round the eye.] [WHITE-EYE.]

Ornith.: A genus of Diaceidæ, with sixty-eight species, ranging over the Ethiopian, Oriental, and Australian regions, as far east as the Fiji Islands, and north to Peking and Japan. Bill shorter than head, acuminate, finely emarginate at tip; nostrils lateral, linear, covered by a membrane; wings with ten primaries; tarsi long; tail moderate, even.

zō-thē-ca, s. [Gr. ζωθήκη (zōthēkē).]

Arch. Arab.: A small compartment or alcove which might be separated from an adjoining compartment by a curtain.

Zouave (ou as w), Zou-ave, s. [Fr., from zouava, the name of a Kabyle or Berber tribe in Algeria.]

A soldier belonging to the light infantry corps of the French army, which were organised in Algeria, soon after the conquest of that country in 1830, and were originally intended to be composed exclusively of the Kabyle tribe. This idea, however, was soon abandoned, and since 1840 the corps has been composed almost entirely of French soldiers, recruited from the veterans of ordinary line regiments, who are distinguished for their fine physique and tried courage. They still, however, retain the picturesque dress originally adopted, consisting of a loose dark-blue jacket and waistcoat, baggy Turkish trousers, yellow leather leggings, white gaiters, a sky-blue sash, and a red fez with yellow tassel. The few corps composed of Algerines still connected with the French army are now known as Turcos. The name was also given to several regiments which served on the side of the North in the American Civil War, but these were only distinguished from the other volunteer regiments by their picturesque uniform.

zōundz, exclam. [See def.] An exclamation contracted from "God's wounds," and much used formerly as an oath, or as an expression of anger or wonder.

zōutçh, v.t. [Ety. doubtful.] To stew, as flounders, whittings, gudgeons, eels, &c., with just enough liquid to cover them. (Prov.)

Min.: A clove-brown variety of Triplite (q.v.).

Zwīn-gū'-an, a. & s. [See def.]

A. adj.: Of pertaining to, or introduced by Zwingli. [B.]

B. As substantive:

Church Hist. (Pl.): The followers of Ulrich Zwingli, or Zuingli, the Swiss reformer, especially in his sacramentarian doctrine. Zwingli was born at Wildhaus, in the Toggenburg, in January, 1484, the year after Luther's birth, and was ordained priest in 1506. In 1516, a year before the commencement of the German Reformation under Luther, he began to preach doctrines which were essentially those of Protestantism. In 1518 he was in conflict with Samsou, a Franciscan friar and an eager salesman of indulgences. In January, 1523, mainly through his exertions, the mass was abolished at Zurich, other cantons speedily following the example. Differences of opinion regarding the Eucharist having arisen in 1524 between the German and Swiss Reformers, Zwingli took a prominent part in the controversy with Luther in a conference at Marburg in September, 1529. On October 15, 1531, he was killed in the battle of Cappel, fought on a politico-religious question between the Protestant and the Roman Catholic Swiss cantons.

dōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophol, exist. -ing -clan, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn. -tion, -sion = zhūn. -clous, -tious, -sious = shūa. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

Zwingli's views on the sacrament were afterwards followed or independently adopted by Calvin. The disciples of the former were called Zwinglians and Sacramentarians; they, however, preferred the name Evangelicals, which subsequently displaced the other two. They also ultimately shared in the name Protestants, which was originally limited to the German reformers.

zyg'-a-dite, s. [Gr. ζυγάδων (zygadēn) = in pairs, jointly; suff. -ite (Mfin.),] Min.: A variety of albite, occurring in twinned plates in fissures of clay-slate at Andreasberg, Hartz.

zy-gæ'-na, s. [Gr. ζυγάνα (zugaína) = a fish, probably the hammer-headed shark (q.v.); see also def. 2.]

1. Entom.: The typical genus of the family Zygenidae (q.v.). Antennae of the male not pectinated, much thickened beyond the middle; fore wings elongate, green, with red streaks or spots; hind wings red, with dark margin; abdomen thick. Newman calls this Zygena. To avoid confounding it with No. 2, Stainton calls it Anthrocera, but retains the name Zygenidae for the family. [BURNET-MORRI.]

2. Ichthy. & Palæont.: Hammer-heads, Hammer-headed Sharks; a genus of Carchariidae, or of Zygenina (q.v.), with five species, widely distributed, but most abundant in the tropics. Anterior part of the head broad, flattened, and produced into a lobe on each side, the extremity of which is occupied by the eye; caudal fin with a pit at its root, and a single notch at its lower margin; no spiracles; nostrils on front edge of the head. Zygena malleus is the commonest species. It is found all along the coast of the United States from Cape Cod southward, and in tropical and sub-tropical seas throughout the world. It reaches a large size, being from seven to eight feet long, and is easily recognized by the curious form of the head, whose width is about twice the length, it being elongated laterally with two arms, which have been compared to the arms of a balance. The first dorsal fin is large, the second quite small, smaller than the anal; the pectorals rather large. Color gray.

ZYGENA MALLEUS.

zy-gæ-ni-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zygenæ(a) [def. 1]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Hawk-moths. Antennæ with scales or pectinated, never ending in a hook, wings scaly, the anterior ones narrow, the posterior rounded. Caterpillar destitute of a horn. Called also Anthroceridae.

zy-gæ-ni'-na, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zygenæ(a) [def. 1]; Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Ichthy.: A group of Carchariidae, with the single genus Zygena. [ZYGÆNA, 2.]

zyg-ân'-trüm, s. [Pref. zyg(o), and Lat. antrum = a cave.]

Zool.: A hollow in the vertebrae of serpents, by which an additional articulation is provided with the vertebra next behind. [Gloss. to Huxley's Classif. of Anim.]

zyg-a-pôph'-ÿ-sis, s. [Pref. zyg, and Eng. apophysis (q.v.).]

Anat.: Either of the two superior or the two inferior processes projecting upwards and downwards from a point near the junction of the pedicle and lamina in a vertebra (q.v.).

zyg-nê-ma, s. [Pref. zyg, and Gr. νῆμα (nêma) = yarn.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Zygnemidae (q.v.). Filaments simple with the green contents arranged in two globular or stellate masses in each cell. Conjugation by transverse processes; spores formed on one of the parent cells or in the cross branch.

zyg-nê-mi-dæ, zyg-nê-mâ'-pô-së, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zygnem(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ or -acæ.]

Bot.: A family or tribe of the sub-order Conserveæ. Cells tubular, united by their truncated extremities into jointed threads, which are at first distinct, and then brought into conjunction by the aid of transverse tubeleta, which discharge the colouring matter. Green-spored Algae abounding in fresh-water.

zy-gô, pref. [Gr. ζυγόν (zygon) = a yoke.] Yoked, joined; having processes more or less resembling a yoke.

zy-gô-bât'-is, s. [Pref. zygo, and Gr. βῆσις (bêsis) = the prickly roach.]

Palæont.: A genus of Myliobatidae, founded on teeth, very similar to those of existing species, from the Norwich Crag and the Miocene of Switzerland. (Günther.)

zy-gô-dâc'-tÿl-æ, s. [ZYGODACTYLE.]

Zool.: A genus of Æquoridae. Light violet-coloured Medusæ, seven to eight inches in diameter, and with long and fibrous dark-violet tentacles. Found in the Atlantic and the North Sea.

zy-gô-dâc'-tÿl-æ, s. pl. [Pref. zygo, and Gr. δάκτυλος (daktulos) = a finger, a toe.]

Ornith.: A sub-order of Picariæ, with seven families: Psittaci (Parrots), Cuculidæ (Cuckoos), Indicatoridæ (Honey Guides), Musophagidæ (Plantain-eaters), Picidæ (Woodpeckers), Rhauphastidæ (Toucans), and Capitonidæ (Barbets), all having two toes in front and two behind. Equivalent to the Scansores (q.v.). Called also Zygodactyle Picarian Birds.

zy-gô-dâc'-tÿl-æ, a. [ZYGODACTYLE.]

1. Of or belonging to the Zygodactyle (q.v.).
2. Having the toes disposed in pairs, two in front and two behind: as, a zygodactyle foot.

zygodactyle picarian birds, s. pl. [ZYGODACTYLE.]

zy-gô-dâc'-tÿl-ÿo, zy-gô-dâc'-tÿl-ôus, a. [ZYGODACTYLE.] Zygodactyle (q.v.).

zy-gô-dôn, s. [Pref. zyg, and Gr. δόντος (odōtos), genit. δόντος (odonōtos) = a tooth.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Zygodontæ.

zy-gô-dôn'-tê-ÿ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from zygodon (q.v.).]

Bot.: An order of Apoecarpous Mosses, having a pyriform striated capsule, an abortive single or double peristome, and a dimidiate smooth veil. Widely distributed, but not numerous in species.

zy-gô-ma, s. [Gr. ζυγάμα (zygōma) = a bolt or bar, from ζυγόν (zygon) = a yoke.]

1. Anat.: An arched and lengthened process projecting from the external surface of the squamous portion of the temporal bone, to which are attached the fleshy fibres of the temporal muscle. It is composed of a tubercle, eminentia articularis, and inferior, superior, and middle roots. The external lateral ligament of the lower jaw is attached to the tubercle.

2. Compar. Anat.: In essentially the same sense as 1. The arch is formed in most vertebrates by the jugal or yoke bone, articulating with the squamosal. The former corresponds with the cheek-bone in man.

zy-gô-mât'-ic, a. [ZYGOMA.] Or or pertaining to the zygoma (q.v.).

Anat.: An arch formed by the zygomatic process of the temporal bone and the posterior part of the malar bone. Called also the Malar-arch.

Anat.: The cheekbone.

zygomatic-fossa, s.

Anat.: The lower portion of the space bridged over by the Zygomat-arch.

zygomatic-muscle, s.

Anat. (Pl.): Two narrow subcutaneous bundles of muscular fibre, a greater and a smaller one, connecting the malar-bone with the angle of the mouth.

zygomatic-process, s.

Anat.: The Zygoma (q.v.).

zygomatic-suture, s.

Anat. (Pl.): The suture uniting the processes of the temporal and cheek bones.

† zy-gô-ma-tÿr'-ÿs, s. [Gr. ζυγάματος (zygōmatōs), genit. ζυγάματος (zygōmatōs), and οὐρά (oura) = the tail.]

Palæont.: A synonym of Nototherium (q.v.).

zy-gô-phÿl-lâ'-pô-së, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zygophyll(um); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -acæ.]

Bot.: Beaucapers; an order of Hypogynous Exogæus, alliance Rutales. Herbs, shrubs, or trees, with hard wood, and the branches often articulated; leaves opposite, unequally pinnate, rarely simple, undotted, and with stipules; flowers solitary or in twos or threes, yellow, white, blue, or red; sepals, four or five, with convolute aestivation; petals, four or five, unguiculate, at first like small scales, aestivation imbricated; stamens, twice as many as the petals, usually arising from the back of a small scale; style simple, generally with four or five furrows; stigma simple, or with four or five lobes; the ovary, which is surrounded at the base with glands or a short wavy disk, simple, with four or five furrows and four or five cells, each with two or more ovules; fruit, capsular, more rarely fleshy, with fewer seeds than there were ovules. Found in the hottest parts of both hemispheres. Known genera seven; species a hundred. (Lindley.)

zy-gô-phÿl-lô-së, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zygophyll(um); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: The typical tribe of Zygophyllacæ, having albuminous seeds.

zy-gôph'-ÿl-lÿm, s. [Pref. zygo, and Gr. φύλλον (phullon) = a leaf.]

Bot.: Bean-caper; the typical genus of the tribe Zygophyllæ. Trees or shrubs, with opposite leaves, consisting of two leaflets, sometimes fleshy; flowers solitary, axillary; calyx unequally five-parted; petals five, stamens ten, each with a scale at its base; capsule five-angled, with five cells, each with a single seed. About twenty-seven species are known. They are natives of the Cape of Good Hope, the Cape de Verde Islands, and the Levant. The flowers of Zygophyllum Fabago, a prostrate, greatly branched herb, are used as a substitute for capers. The seeds of Z. simplex, an evil-smelling Indian plant, are eaten by the wild tribes of Sind and the Punjab; the Arabs beat the leaves in water, and apply the infusion to diseased eyes.

zy-gô-sân-rÿs, s. [Pref. zygo, and Gr. σαύρα (saura) = a lizard.]

Palæont.: A genus of Labyrinthodontia. Skull irregular, with concave sides, an obtuse snout, and a concave occipital border; it is lofty in the occipital region, while falling gradually in front and rapidly on the sides. Orbits slightly posterior, large, irregular. Premaxillary teeth two or more on each side, larger than the maxillary teeth, which are sixteen or eighteen on each side; all are conical, strong, and nearly straight, with about twenty grooves at the base. Known species one, Zygosaurus lucius, from the Zechstein (Middle Permian), of the Government of Perm in Russia. (Brit. Assoc. Rep. (1874), pp. 163, 164.)

zy-gô-sêl'-mî-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zygoselmis(s); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of Infusoria, or Flagellata-Euatomata, with six genera, mostly from fresh-water. Animals solitary, free-swimming, or repent; flagella two, vibratile, similar; endoplasm sometimes green; oral aperture distinct, terminal; pigment-spots frequently present.

zy-gô-sêl'-mîs, s. [Pref. zygo, and Gr. σελῆς (selis) = an angler's noose made of hair.]

Zool.: The typical genus of Zygoselmidae (q.v.). Animals solitary, from fresh-water; two flagella, at the base of which is the oral aperture, with a distinct tubular pharynx. One or perhaps two species.

zy-gô-sis, e. [Gr. = a yoking, a balancing, âte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hêre, camel, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sire, sir, marine; gô, pôtt, or, wôre, wolf, wôrk, whô, sôn: mûta, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ô; ey = â; qu = kw.

Bot.: The same as CONJUGATION (q.v.).

z̄y-gō-sphēne, s. [Pref. zygo-, and Gr. σφῆν (sphēn) = a wedge.]

Zool.: A conical process on the front of the vertebrae of Ophidia, which fits into the zygantrum of that next in front.

z̄y-gō-spōre, s. [Pref. zygo-, and Gr. σπορά (spora), σπόρος (sporos) = a seed.]

Bot.: The term applied by Huxley to the product of conjugation of a spores when it is impossible to say which represent the male and which the female element, there being no morphological difference between the modified hyphae which enter into relation with one another.

z̄y-gō-stig-ma, s. [Pref. zygo-, and Eng. stigma (q.v.).]

Botany:

1. Two stigmas, the branches of which adhere to each other.
2. A genus of Gentianae, in which this peculiarity occurs. The species are from Brazil.

z̄yme, s. [Gr. ζύμη (zymē) = leaven.]

Pathol.: (See extract).

"Corresponding with the adjective zymotic is the substantive zyme. This is a useful name, by which we refer to the poisonous cause of zymotic diseases. It is simpler than the word zymine, originally proposed by Dr. Farr; and (what is much more important) to speak of a zymotic poison as a 'zyme' does not imply the acceptance of any particular theory of disease, while, on the other hand, the use of the word 'germ' distinctly conveys the idea of some organized structure, itself the cause of disease by subsequent growth and multiplication."—Dr. Horriog, in Quain's Dict. Medicine, p. 1806.

"To this body, this mother of the ferment, which has not at present been satisfactorily isolated, the name of zymogen has been applied. But it is better to reserve the term zymogen as a generic name for all such bodies as not being themselves actual ferments, may, by lateral changes, give rise to ferments—for all 'mothers of ferment,' in fact."—Foster: Physiol. (ed. 4th), p. 271.

z̄y-mō-lōg'-ic, z̄y-mō-lōg'-yo-al, a. [Eng. zymology(y); -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to zymology.

z̄y-mōl'-ō-gist, s. [Eng. zymology(y); -ist.] One skilled in zymology, or the fermentation of liquors.

z̄y-mōl'-ō-gy, s. [Pref. zymo-, and Gr. λόγος (logos) = a word, a discourse.] A treatise on the fermentation of liquors, or the doctrine of fermentation.

z̄y-mōme, s. [Gr. ζύμωμα (zymōma) = a fermented mixture.]

Chem.: An old name for that portion of gluten which is insoluble in alcohol.

z̄y-mōm'-ō-tēr, z̄y-mō-sim'-ō-tēr, s. [Pref. zymo-, or Eng. zymos(is), and meter (q.v.).]

Chem. & Brewing: An instrument for detecting the condition and process of fermenting wort or mash.

z̄y-mō-soōpe, s. [Pref. zymo-, and Gr. σκοπέω (skopēō) = to see, to observe.]

Chem.: An instrument contrived by Zenneck for testing the fermenting power of yeast, by bringing it in contact with sugar-water, and observing the quantity of carbonic anhydride evolved. (Watts.)

z̄y-mō-sim'-ō-tēr, s. [ZYMOMETER.]

z̄y-mō'-sis, s. [Gr. ζύμωσις (zymōsis) = fermentation.]

Pathol.: A process analogous to that of the Tetanus in fermentation, by which a malarious or similar poison is introduced into the system. [ZYME.] The word is occasionally used in the sense of Zymotic Disease (q.v.).

"The necessity for employing the word zymosis does not seem to be felt as yet; but the same reasons which lead us to speak of the agent as a zyme should also guide us to use zymosis in the place of more usual periphrases."—Dr. Horriog, in Quain's Dict. Medicine, p. 1806.

AN HISTORICAL SKETCH OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE, ITS ORIGIN, DIALECTS, STRUCTURE, AND AFFINITIES.

A spoken language is a number of different sounds made by the tongue and the other organs of speech: it may be written or printed upon paper or other material, by the aid of marks, signs, or symbols. Words are articulate sounds used to express perception and thought. The aggregate of these articulate sounds, accepted by and current among any community, is called speech or language. The language of the same community often presents local varieties: to these varieties is given the name of dialects. The growth of language is dealt with and taught by Comparative Grammar. By the aid of that science languages may be classified in two ways: (1) According to the peculiarities of their grammatical structure, or the mode of denoting the relations of words to one another; and (2) according to historical relationship. Historical relationship rests upon (a) the similarity of grammatical structure; and (b) the fundamental identity of roots. It may be shown by comparing the grammar and vocabulary of any two or more languages.

Before entering on an Historical Sketch of the English Language, it is necessary first to consider what the "English Language" is. Broadly speaking, it is the language spoken or written by the people of England from Anglo-Saxon times to the present. But "English" is not a fixed quantity to be marked out by strictly drawn limits or bounds.

To take a familiar illustration, the English language may be likened to the effect produced on a calm, smooth body of water when a stone is thrown into it. There is the well-defined centre, from which issue ripples, large at first, but gradually diminishing and becoming fainter and fainter, till at last it is impossible to say where they end, and where the water becomes smooth and calm again. So it is with the language. It is very rarely possible to define the exact time at which a word became a unit of the English language, while to determine the date when a word became obsolete is well nigh, if not actually, impossible. To some a word may appear dead, while to others it still lives. But the process of decay and renovation is continually going on; old words die gradually out, new words press in to take their places.

It will thus be seen that it is impossible to define "English" by any strict line or definite limits. It is the same with all languages:

"All living language is in a condition of constant growth and change. It matters not to what part of the world we may go: if we can find for any existing speech a record of its predecessor at some time distant from it in the past, we shall perceive that the two are different—and more or less different, mainly in proportion to the distance of time that separates them. It is so with the Romanic tongues of southern Europe, as compared with their common progenitor the Latin; so with the modern dialects of India, as compared with the recorded forms of speech intermediate between them and the Sanskrit, or with the Sanskrit itself; and not less with the English of our day, as compared with that of other days. An English speaker even of only a century ago would find not a little in our every-day speech which he would understand with difficulty, or not at all; if we were to hear Shakespeare read aloud a scene from one of his own works, it would be in no small part unintelligible (by reason, especially, of the great difference between his pronunciation and ours); Chaucer's English (500 years ago) we master by dint of good solid application, and with considerable help from a glossary; and King Alfred's English (1000 years ago), which we call Anglo-Saxon, is not easier to us than German. All this, in spite of the fact that no one has gone about of set purpose to alter English speech, in any generation among the thirty or forty that have lived between us and Alfred, any more than in our own. Here, then, is another side of the life of language for us to deal with, and to explain, if we can. Life, here as elsewhere, appears to involve growth and change as an essential element; and the remarkable analogies which exist between the birth and growth and decay and extinction of a language and those of an organized being, or of a species, have been often enough noticed and dwelt upon: some have even inferred from them that language is an organism, and leads an organic life, governed by laws with which men cannot interfere."*

And this continued change is not confined to alterations of the uttered and audible forms of words: it applies as well to alterations in the outward forms of words, as to changes in meaning. A word may change its form to any extent, without change of meaning, as well as change its meaning without change of form. Just as it is the case with organic beings, the growth of which consists in removal and re-supply, so it is with language.

"Existence, in speech, is use; and disuse is destruction. . . . If anything that people once thought and talked about comes to concern them no longer, its phraseology goes into oblivion—unless, of course, it be preserved, as a memory of the past, by some of those means which culture supplies. . . . The technical terms of chivalry mostly fell out as those of modern warfare came in; those of astrology, as this was crowded from existence by astronomical science. Only, we have here and there, not always consciously, in our present speech, reminiscences of the old order of things, in the shape of words transferred to new uses. . . . But, in the second place, words are crowded out of use, and so out of life, by the coming into use of other words which mean the same thing, and which for some cause, definable or not, win the popular favor, and supplant their predecessors. . . . By these means, there is in every language a certain amount of obsolescent material, in various stages: some words that are only unusual, or restricted to particular phrases (like stead, in in stead alone); some that belong to a particular style, archaic or poetical; some that have become strange and unintelligible to ordinary speakers, though formerly in every-day use; some that survive only in local dialects. And the older records of any tongue, if preserved, show words in greater or less number that are gone past recovery."†

But this loss in a language is more than counterbalanced by the acquisition of new material, new inventions, new trades, new ideas, all of which give rise to new words, terms, or phrases.

"A language like ours—since we come in contact with nearly all the nations of the world, and draw in to ourselves whatever we find of theirs that can be made useful to us, and since even our culture derives from various sources—comes to contain specimens from dialects of very diverse origin. Thus, we have religious words from the Hebrew, as sabbath, seraph, jubilee; certain old-style scientific terms from the Arabic, as algebra, alkali, zenith, cipher, besides a considerable heterogeneous list, like lemon, sugar (ultimately Sanskrit), sherbet, magazine; from the Persian, caravan, chess, shawl, and even a word which has won so familiar and varied use as check; from Hindi, calico and chintz, punch and toddy; from Chinese, tea and nankeen; from American Indian languages, canoe and mocassin, guano and potato, sachem and caucus. . . . For this

* Whitney: Life & Growth of Language, ch. iii., pp. 33-4.

† Ibid.: ch. vi., pp. 99, 100-102.

preponderance, in one aspect, of the borrowed material in English speech, there are easily assignable reasons. The Norman invasion, leading to a long antagonism and final fusion of a French-speaking with a Saxon-speaking race, brought in by violence, as it were, a great store of French words, of Latin origin, and thus made it comparatively easy to bring in without violence a great many more.*

Another source of the enrichment of a language is the composition of words, the putting together of two independent elements to form a simple designation. The relation between the two elements may be of every variety: thus, a headache is a pain in the head; a head-dress, a dress for the head; a headland, a point of land comparable to a head; a headsman, a man for cutting off heads. Another is the turning of nouns and adjectives into verbs: thus we say harden, roughen, demoralize, &c.; and we even turn one part of speech directly into another without using any external sign of the transfer: thus we say, to chair a candidate; to hand a book; to table a resolution; to wire a message; to toe a mark, &c. The suffixes -ism, -ist, ultimately of Greek origin, and imported through the French, have made themselves part of our living apparatus of derivation, in many cases abused, as in such monstrosities as walkist, cueist, &c.

The corruptions which words have undergone are of many and various kinds. Most of them are, doubtless, due to the influence of the wear and tear of "Time, whose slippery wheel doth play

In humane causes with inconstant sway,
Who exiles, alters, and disguises words."

Sylvester: Du Bartas, p. 173 (1621).

The Rev. A. S. Palmer † arranges corrupted words under the following analytical groups:

1. Words corrupted so as to be significant, and in some sense appropriate; such as acorn, ambergrease, battlement, belfry, &c.
2. Words corrupted so as to convey a meaning, but one totally inappropriate, though sounding familiarly to the ear; such as battle-door, cheese-bowl, featherfew, titmouse, wheat-ear, &c.
3. Words corrupted so as to give rise to a total misconception, and consequently to false explanations, such as attic, humble-pie, hurricane, husband, &c.
4. Words, which, though not actually corrupted from their true shape, are suggestive of a false derivation, and have been generally accepted in that mistaken sense; such as colonel, cozen, hawker, world, &c.

Of words purely invented for some special substance, thing, or condition, language presents but rare examples. Special words or terms are frequently proposed to meet special circumstances, but they seldom survive. Gas, however, is an instance of such a word which has passed into common speech. The same chemist who devised gas, also suggested blas for that property of the heavenly bodies whereby they regulate the changes of time, but it failed to gain acceptance, and soon dropped out of sight and was forgotten. A new word must supply an antecedent blank; or else it ought, on the score of exactness, perspicuity, brevity, or euphony, to be an improvement on a word already existing.

"The use of new terms," says Webster, "is dictated by necessity or utility; sometimes to express shades of difference or signification, for which the language did not supply a suitable term; sometimes to express a combination of ideas by a single word, which otherwise would require a circumlocution. These benefits, which are often perceived, as it were, instinctively by a nation, recommend such words to common use, till the cavils of critics are silenced by the weight of authority." (Letter to J. Pickering, 1817, p. 7.)

Few suggested new words fulfil these requirements. Science, art, and manufactures contribute the majority of new words to the language. When some new process, machine,

* Whitney: ut supra, ch. vii., pp. 115, 118.

† Folk Etymology, Introduction, p. xxvii.

instrument or the like appears, necessarily a new word is required by which to designate it, as phonograph, telephone, telpherage, &c.

“When galvanism, ozone, and chloroform were discovered, and when locomotives and stereoscopes were invented, it was necessary to have names for them. Cult is a term, which, as we value exactness, we can ill do without, seeing how completely religion has lost its original signification. Civility, formerly the substantive of both civil and civilize . . . was judiciously relieved of one of its meanings, by civilization. Financial, international, noticeable, and pretentious, enable us to dispense with periphrases.”*

Collide, diplomatist, executive, insularity, monograph, physicist, and specie, are instances of words proposed to fill existing blanks, and readily adopted. Political life and changes at times give origin to new terms, as witness Adullamite, closure, jingo, but they seldom long survive the occasion for which they were invented. With these we may connect Boycott, tenant-right, Home-Rule, Fenian, &c. Occasionally some notorious act gives rise to a new word, which finds general adoption, as to Burke.

The English language is shown by Comparative Grammar to belong to a group of allied languages to which the name Teutonic has been given. Its philological affinities are with the languages of Germany, Holland, and Scandinavia, rather than with the native languages of the British Isles. These last have been wholly superseded in the southern, central, and eastern parts of Great Britain. In Wales, however, the British is still spoken; as is Gaelic, or Erse, in Ireland and in the Highlands of Scotland. The Teutones or Teutons were a tribe of Germans, who were subdued by the Roman General Marius, B.C. 100. the terms Teutonicus and Theoticus were afterwards applied to the Germanic people of Europe generally, and the term Teuton or Teutonic is now used to denote Germans, Dutch, Scandinavians, and those of Anglo-Saxon descent, as opposed to Celts. By the Germans their own language is still called Deutsch, of which Dutch is only another form. The Teutonic group of languages may be divided into three main sections or groups, from which all the others spring. These are:

I. LOW GERMAN. Of Gothic, the oldest and most primitive of the Teutonic dialects, almost the sole record surviving is the translation of the Bible made by Bishop Ulphilas (A.D. 318-388) of which we possess some considerable portions of the Gospels and St. Paul's Epistles, some pieces of the Old Testament, and a small portion of a Commentary. It was spoken by the Eastern and Western Goths, who occupied the province of Dacia, whence they made incursions into Asia, Galatia, and Cappadocia.

Old Frisian is exemplified by documents of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Modern Frisian is still spoken in Friesland, along the coasts and islands of the North Sea, between the Weser and the Elbe, and in Holland and Sleswick. This dialect is more closely allied to English than any other of the Low German Languages. There is, indeed, a well-known couplet, every word in which is both Frisian and English:

“Good butter and good cheese
Is good English and good Fries.”

Old Saxon had its origin in the districts of Munster, Essen, and Cleves, and was spoken between the Rhine and the Elbe. The most important composition in the Old Saxon dialect is a poetical version (of the ninth century), of the Gospels entitled the Heljand (= Old English Heiland = the Healer or Saviour). The following is an extract:

Nativitas Christi Pastoribus annunciata.

The following extract from the same poem, with a translation into West-Saxon is quoted from a paper on the Heljand in the Foreign Quarterly Review, April 1831, by Dr. Latham:

(Heljand.)	(West-Saxon.)	(English.)

The Old Saxon is very closely allied to English, retaining many Teutonic inflexions that have disappeared from other Low German dialects.

II. Of the SCANDINAVIAN dialects the Icelandic is the purest and oldest. Old Icelandic, from the eleventh to the thirteenth century is often called “Old Norse,” but this term belongs properly to Old Norwegian.

III. HIGH GERMAN is divided into three stages, of which the Old High German comprises a number of dialects spoken in Upper or South Germany from the beginning of the eighth to the middle of the eleventh century; Middle High German was spoken in Upper Germany from the beginning of the twelfth to the end of the fifteenth century; and Modern (or New) High German from the end of the fifteenth century to the present time.

The Teutonic dialects form a sub-division of that great family of related languages known as Indo-European, from its comprehending not only nearly all the languages of Europe, but also those Indian dialects which have sprung from the Sanscrit: the term Aryan (= honourable, noble) is also sometimes applied to the family.

This Indo-European (or Aryan) family of languages has two great divisions:

I. The EUROPEAN DIVISION:

1. The Teutonic Languages.
2. The Celtic (or Keltic) Languages, consisting of (1) The Cymric class, consisting of (a) Welsh, (b) Cornish (died out about middle of sixteenth century), (c) Bas-Breton. (2) The Gaelic (or Gadhelic) class, consisting of (a) Erse or Irish, (b) Gaelic (spoken in the Highlands of Scotland), (c) Manx (spoken in the Isle of Man).
3. The Italic (or Romanic) Languages, comprising (1) The Old Italian dialects, as Oscan, Umbrian, Sabine. (2) The Romanic dialects, which have sprung from the Latin, comprising (a) Italian, (b) French, (c) Provençal, (d) Spanish, (e) Portuguese, (f) Roumansch (spoken in southern Switzerland), (g) Wallachian (spoken in Wallachia and Moldavia).
4. The Hellenic Languages, comprising (1) Ancient Greek (with its various dialects: Attic, Ionic, Doric, and Æolic). (2) Modern Greek.
5. The Slavonic Languages, comprising (1) Bulgarian. (2) Russian. (3) Illyric. (4) Polish. (5) Bohemian. (6) Slovakian. (7) Upper and Lower Sorbian. (8) Polabian (on the Elbe).
6. The Lettic Languages, comprising (1) Old Prussian. (2) Lettish (or Livonian). (3) Lithuanian.

II. The ASIATIC DIVISION:

Sanscrit, Prakrit, Pali, Modern Indian Dialects, Gypsy Dialect, Zend, the Cuneiform Inscriptions of Darius, Xerxes, and their successors, Parsi, and Modern Persian.*

The people who spoke the old and primitive tongue from which all these languages have sprung "must have lived together as one great community more than 3,000 years ago. It was formerly held that tradition, as well as the evidence of language, pointed to the north-eastern part of the Iranian table-land, near the Hindu-Kush mountains, as the original abode of this primitive people;" but a more recent view is that Europe (probably Southern Scandinavia), and not Asia, was the primal seat of the Aryans. †

To recapitulate, English (1) is a member of the Indo-European family; (2) belongs to the Teutonic group; (3) is a Low German dialect; and (4) was brought into Britain by wandering tribes from the Continent, about A.D. 449, according to Bede, who makes the invaders consist of three tribes, Angles, Saxons, and Jutes. The first of these came from the duchy of Sleswick; ‡ the Saxons from the country between the Elbe and the Eider; and the Jutes from the upper part of Sleswick, or South Jutland. With these there was no doubt a considerable intermixture of Frisians.

The settlements were probably made in the following order:

1. Jutes, under Hengest and Horsa, settled in Kent, the Isle of Wight, and a part of Hampshire, A.D. 449 or 450.
2. The first division of Saxons, under Ella and Cissa, settled in Sussex, A.D. 477.
3. The second division of Saxons, under Cerdic and Cynric, settled in Wessex (comprising Hampshire, Berkshire, Wiltshire, Somersetshire, Dorsetshire, Gloucestershire, and Devonshire), A.D. 495.
4. The third division of Saxons settled in Essex, A.D. 530.
5. The first division of Angles settled in East Anglia (comprising Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, and parts of Lincolnshire and Northamptonshire).
6. The second division of Angles, under Ida, settled in the kingdom of Beornicia (between the Tweed and the Firth of Forth), A.D. 547.

"Two other kingdoms were subsequently established by the Angles—Deira (between Tweed and Humber), and Mercia [=march or frontier], comprehending the Midland counties.

"Teutonic tribes were known in Britain, though they made no settlements before the coming of the Jutes. In the fourth century they made attacks upon the eastern and south-eastern coast of this island, from the Wash to the Isle of Wight, which, on that account, was called 'Littus Saxonicum,' or the Saxon shore or Saxon frontier; and an officer known as the Count of the Saxon Shore (Comes Littoris Saxonici per Britannias) was appointed for its defence. These Teutonic invaders were known to the Romans and Celts by the name of Saxons; and this term was afterwards applied by them to the Teutonic settlers of the fifth century, who, however, never appear to have called themselves Saxons, but always Ænglisc or English.*

CELTIC ELEMENT.

Very few words were borrowed by the invaders from the original inhabitants (Celts or Kelts): basket, brag, bludgeon, bodkin, bother, bots, cairn, darn, shamrock, clan, claymore, spate, brose, and, through the French, baggage, bar, barrel, gravel, glebe, pickaxe, pottage, pouch, rogue, tan, truant, are examples.

Garnett† gives a list of nearly two hundred of these words, many of which belong to household management; and others, such as spree, bane, whop, balderdash, &c., can scarcely be reckoned Classical English. The few survivals tend to show how complete was the extermination of the Celts; they prove that "the Celtic women were kept as slaves, while their husbands, the old owners of the land, were slaughtered in heaps."‡

LATIN ELEMENT.

What is called the Latin of the First Period, as incorporated into English, consists only of a few words that exercised no influence on the language, being found only in names of places, as castra = a camp, found in Chester, Doncaster, Manchester, Winchester, Towcester, &c.

About A.D. 596 the English were converted to Christianity, and during the four following centuries many Latin words were introduced by the Latin missionaries and by English translators of Latin works into their own language. This is known as the Latin of the Second Period. Examples are priest (from presbyter); sacrament (from sacramentum); calic (from calix = a cup); church, &c. Also a few adopted Greek words, as bishop (from ἐπίσκοπος = an overseer), apostle, monk, angel, &c.; and some names of articles of commerce, as butter (butyrum), cheese (caseus), tunic (tunica), lettuce (lactuca), pound (pondus), candle (candela), trout (trutta), &c.

SCANDINAVIAN ELEMENT.

In the year 787 the Northmen, Norsemen, or Normans, of Scandinavia, i.e., of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, began to make descents on the eastern coast of England, Scotland, the Hebrides, and Ireland. These attacks went on for three centuries. In the ninth century these Danes obtained a permanent footing in the northern and eastern parts of England, subduing the kingdoms of Northumbria, East Anglia, and Mercia; and by the eleventh century they had become so strong that Danish kings sat on the throne of England from A.D. 1013 to 1042.

The traces of Scandinavian influence on the English Language are numerous, and may be classed under three heads: (1) names of places; (2) in the Old English Literature of the North of England; and (3) in the Northern Provincial Dialects. Under the first head come the suffixes -by = a town, as in Grimsby, Whitby, &c.; -fell (Icel., fjall, fell) = a hill or table-land, as in Scafell, Crossfell, &c.; -dale = a valley; -thwaite = a forest clearing;

-toft = a homestead, as in Lowestoft; -wick = a creek, a bay, as in Ipswich, Berwick, &c.; -oe, -ea (Icel. -ey) = an island (eyot), as in Faroe, Chelsea; -ness = a cape (or nose), as in Caithness, Fifeness, the Naze, &c. Besides these there are a good many common words of undoubted Danish origin, such as are, till, until, fro, froward, ill, bound (for a place), bask, busk, &c.

It is thus seen that the Anglo-Saxon was a composite tongue, formed by the gradual blending of several kindred dialects, principally introduced into England between the middle of the fifth and the middle of the sixth century, with a considerable infusion of Latin derived from the Romanised Britons. The Anglo-Saxon was an inflected or synthetic language, like the Latin and Greek. It had five cases. The article, noun, adjective, and pronoun were declinable, having different forms for three genders and two numbers: the adjective, as in German, had two inflections, the definite and the indefinite; the verb had four moods, the indicative, subjunctive, imperative, and infinitive, and but two tenses, the present, or indefinite (used also as a future), and the past. There were also compound tenses in the active voice, and a passive voice, formed, as in English, by auxiliaries. The auxiliaries usually retained their force as independent verbs, and were not employed as mere indications of time, as in English. The Anglo-Saxon had ten forms for the article, five for the noun, and ten terminations for the positive degree of adjectives; the irregular verbs had thirteen endings, without including the inflected cases of the participles.

The Anglo-Saxon language attained its height during the reign of Alfred (870-901).

In Anglo-Saxon poetry the distinctive feature was alliteration, the rule of which, stated in general terms, was as follows: In each couplet, three emphatic words (or by poetic licence accented syllables), two in the first line (or half-line), and one in the second, must commence with the same consonant, or with vowels, in which case the initials might be, and generally were, different.

The event which exercised the greatest influence on the English Language was the Norman Invasion in 1066. Through it French became the language of the Court, of the nobility, of the clergy, of literature, and of all who wished or sought for advancement in Church or State. From the Normans are derived most of the terms connected with

1. FEUDALISM & WAR.—Aid, arms, armour, assault, banner, baron, captain, chivalry, duke, fealty, fief, homage, lance, tournament, vassal, &c.
2. THE CHURCH.—Altar, Bible, baptism, ceremony, friar, homily, piety, penance, prayer, preach, sermon, sacrifice, saint, tonsure, &c.
3. THE LAW.—Assize, attorney, case, cause, chancellor, court, estate, fee, felony, judge, jury, plaintiff, plea, plead, statute, sue, tax, ward.
4. THE CHASE.—Bay (2), s., brace, chase, couple, course, covert, falcon, leveret, quarry, rabbit, reynard, venison, &c.

For all this, as Robert of Gloucester says:

“Lowe men holdeth to Englyss, and to her kinde speche yute.”
 (“The lower classes cling to English, and to their native tongue yet.”)

The most important changes due to French influence are: (1) c before the Conquest was pronounced hard, like k, after the Conquest it assumed a soft sound like s, and also the softened sounds of ch, sh; (2) s, which was the general plural termination of French nouns, became the received sign of the plural in English; and (3) -th, the ending of the third person singular of the present indicative, was gradually softened to s.

In process of time the two races—the conquerors and the conquered—coalesced, and became one people, the language of the majority prevailing, so much so, that in 1349 Latin ceased to be taught in schools through the medium of French,* and in 1362 it was enacted by Act of Parliament that all pleadings in the law courts should henceforth be conducted in English, because, as is stated in the preamble to the Act, French was becoming so much unknown in the kingdom that persons who were parties to suits had no knowledge or understanding of what was said for or against them by the pleaders.

The Norman-French was essentially a Latin tongue, and through it was added to the English another Latin element, usually termed the Latin of the Third Period.†

The Latin element is thus seen to have entered the language either directly or indirectly: indirectly in the first three periods, and directly in the fourth period. We frequently find two forms of the same word, one taken indirectly, the other directly from the Latin:—

Indirectly, through Norman-French.	Directly borrowed from the Latin.	Latin.

* Trevisa (Polycronicon, ii. 157) fixes the time of the great plague of 1349 as the point after which the popular fancy for speaking French began to abate. He says: "As hyt ys yknowe hong meny maner people buþ in þis ylond, þer buþ also of so meny people longages & tonges; noþeles Walschmen & Scottes, þat buþ nogt ymelled wiþ ober nacions, holdeþ wel nyg here furste longage & speche, botexef Scottes, þat were som tyme confederat & wonede wiþ þe Pictes, drawe somewhat after here speche. † The title of Latin of the Fourth Period is given to the large number of Latin words introduced into the language from the revival of learning in the beginning of the sixteenth century up to the present time.

We also borrowed words from the Greek, but to a much less degree, while miscellaneous words have become naturalized from other languages, as, from Hebrew (abbot, amen, cabal, cherub, sabbath, &c.), from Arabic (admiral, alchemy, alkali, arrack, assassin, caliph, chemistry, talisman, zenith, &c.), from Persian (caravan, chess, dervish, orange, pasha, sash, shawl, turban, &c.), from American (canoe, cocoa, hammock, maize, tobacco, tomahawk, wigwam, &c.), and from Turkish (caftan, chouse, divan, scimitar, &c.). In short, we have borrowed from almost every language under the sun such words as are appropriate to materials or productions new to us.

Before the Norman Conquest there were two dialects in England—the Northern and the Southern. The former has handed down to us a very scanty literature, while the latter was the literary language of the country, and in it were written the best of our oldest English works, many of which have come down to us. Dr. Morris gives the following as the chief points of grammatical difference between the two dialects:*

- (1) The loss of -n in the infinitive ending of verbs:
N. drinc-a, S. drinc-an = to drink.
- (2) The first person singular indicative ends in -u or -o, instead of -e:
N. Ic drinc-o. S. drinc-e = I drink.
- (3) The second person singular present indicative often ends in -s, rather than in -st, and we find it in the second person singular perfect indicative of weak verbs:
N. dhu ge-plantad-es. S. ge-plantad-est = thou hast planted.
- (4) The third person singular frequently ends in -s instead of -th:
N. he gewyrces. S. gewyrceath = he works.
- (5) The third plural present indicative and the second person plural imperative often have -s instead of -th:
N. hia onfoas. S. hi onfoath = they receive.
- (6) The occasional omission of ge- before the passive participle:
N. hered. S. geherod = praised.
- (7) The occasional use of active participle in -and instead of -end:
N. drincande. S. drincende = drinking.
- (8) The use of aren for syndon or synd = are (in all persons of the plural).

In nouns there is much irregularity as compared with the Southern dialect:

- (9) Plurals end in -a, -u, -o, or -e, instead of -an:
N. heorta. S. heortan = hearts.
N. witegu. S. witegan = prophets.
N. ego. S. eagan = eyes.
N. nome. S. naman = names.
- (10) -es is sometimes found instead of -e as the genitive suffix of feminine nouns.
- (11) the and thio are sometimes found for se (masc.) and seo (fem.) = the.
- (12) The plural article tha sometimes occurs for the demonstrative pronoun hi = they.

The oldest specimen of English known is preserved in a quotation by the Venerable Bede (672-735) from the composition of an early contemporary, Cædmon, a monk of Durham.† It is here given in two versions:

Nu scylnn hergan	Nu we sceolan herigeon	Now we should praise xxxii. That the proud and puffed up in spirit are to be admonished in one way, and in another the humble and faint-hearted.

The proud and presumptuous are to be admonished in one way, in another the humble and diffident. The presumptuous when too confident in themselves, despise and revile others. The faint-hearted and diffident, perceiving their want of courage and strength, often despair. The proud and presumptuous think that all their own special thoughts and deeds are the best; but the humble and timid think that what they do is very contemptible, and therefore despair. But the teacher must very narrowly investigate the works of the presumptuous, that they show them that in the things wherein they please themselves so much they displease God.

The following extract from an entry in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, under the year 1137, shows the progress of the language:—

I neither can nor may tell all the wounds or all the tortures which they inflicted on wretched men in the land; and that lasted the nineteen winters that Stephen was king; and ever it was worse and worse. They laid imposts on the towns continually, and called it "censerie." When the wretched men had no more to give, they robbed and burned all the towns, so that thou mightest well go a day's journey and thou shouldst never find a man sitting in town, or the land tilled. Then was corn dear, and flesh, and cheese, and butter; for there was none in the land. Wretched men died of hunger; some went seeking alms who at one while were rich men; some fled out of the land.

The following extract from the Ancren Riwe (= Rules for Anchorites) gives an example of West Saxon (Dorsetshire) dialect about 1220.* It illustrates an early stage of the transition from Anglo-Saxon to English:

Bacbitare, þe biteð oðer men bihinden, beoð of two maneres: auh þe latere beoð wurse. þe uorme cumeð al openlich and saiðh euel to anoðer, and speaueð ut his atter, so muchel so him euer to mruþe cumeð, and gulcheð ut al somed þet þe attri heorte sent up to þe tunge. Auh hwon hit alles cumeð forð þeonne is hit yeoluh atter.

(Translation.)

Backbiters, who bite other men behind [their backs] are of two kinds, but the latter [kind] is the worse. The former cometh quite openly, and sayeth evil of another, and speweth out his venom, as much as ever comes to his mouth, and throweth out, all at once, what the venomous heart sends up to their tongue. But the latter comes out quite in a different way, and is a worse fiend than the other, yet under the cloak of a friend. He casteth down his head, and begins to sigh before he says anything, and makes sad cheer, [and] moralizes long about [the point] to be the better believed. But, when it all comes forth, then is it yellow venom.

By the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries it is possible to distinguish three great varieties of English:

- (1) The Southern dialect, spoken in all the counties south of the Thames, in Somersetshire, Gloucestershire, and in parts of Herefordshire and Worcestershire.
- (2) The Northern dialect, spoken in Northumberland, Durham, and Yorkshire, and in the Lowlands of Scotland.
- (3) The Midland dialect spoken in the whole of the Midland counties, in the East Anglian counties, and in the counties west of the Pennine chain, i.e., in Cumberland, Westmoreland, Lancashire, and Shropshire.

The most convenient test by which to distinguish these dialects from one another is the inflection of the plural present indicative: the Southern dialect employs -eth; the Midland -en; the Northern uses -es. The Northern dialect has its imperative plural in -es; the Southern and Midland dialects in -eth.

The Southern dialect was fond, as it still is, of using v where the other dialects used f, as vo = fa = foe, vinger = finger, &c. In the Old Kentish of the fourteenth century z was used for s, as, zinge = to sing. The Northern dialect used the guttural k in many words where the Southern preferred the palatal ch, as:

N. rike = S. riche = kingdom. N. eroke = S. crouche = cross.

The Southern dialect often had ō and u, where the Northern had ā and i:

N. hil = S. hul = hill. N. pit = S. put = pit. N. án = S. ón (oon) = one.

In the Northern dialect -at = to, was used as a sign of the infinitive mood:

N. sal and suld = S. schel and schuld.

The Northern dialect contained many Scandinavian forms, as:

N. hethen = S. henne = hence. N. til = S. to = to.
 N. fra = S. fram = from. N. slik = S. swich = such.
 N. -by = S. tun = town. N. werre = S. wyrse = worse.

The Midland dialect has various forms, of which (1) the East Midland (spoken in Lincolnshire, Norfolk, and Suffolk) and (2) the West Midland (spoken in Cumberland, Westmoreland, Lancashire, Cheshire, and Shropshire) are most marked.

* Edited for Camden Society by Rev. J. Morton, B.D., 1853, pp. 86-88.

The East Midland dialect had one especial peculiarity, viz., the coalescence of pronouns with verbs, and even with pronouns, as:

caldes = calde + es = called them.
hes = he + es = he + them.

get = ge + it = she + it.
mea = me + es = one (Fr. on) + them.

The West Midland had its peculiarities, as ho = she; hit = its; shyn = shuln (plural).

The Midland dialect was the form of speech which culminated in the present literary English. As stated above it had many varieties, but the most important was the East Midland. As early as the beginning of the thirteenth century it had thrown off most of its older inflections, and had begun to be cultivated as a literary dialect. In this dialect Wycliffe, Gower, and Chaucer wrote, as well as the older and well-known authors, Orm (or Ormin) and Robert of Brunne. It was, however, Chaucer's influence that raised this dialect to the position of a standard language. In Chaucer's time it was the language of the metropolis, and had probably found its way south of the Thames into Kent and Surrey.

At a later period the Southern dialect had so far retreated before it as to become Western rather than Southern; in fact, the latter designation was applied to the language which had become the standard one.

George Puttenham (Art of English Poetrie), writing in 1589, speaks of three dialects—the Northern, Western, and Southern.* The Northern was that spoken north of the Trent; the Southern was that south of the Trent, which was also the language of the court, of the metropolis, and of the surrounding shires; the Western, as now, was confined to the counties of Gloucestershire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, &c.†

The celebrated Proclamation of Henry III. (1258) is by many considered the earliest specimen of composition in the English tongue.‡

To make the distinction between the dialects more clear, the following specimens, all representing the language of the same half-century are given:—

1. SOUTHERN DIALECT.—Of this the following quotation from the Ayenbite of Inwytt (= The Remorse of Conscience), by Dan Michael of Northgate (Kent), c. A.D. 1340, is an example:§

I say not this but that in every shyre of England there be gentlemen and others that speake bnt specially write as good Southerne as we of Middlesex or Surrey do, but not the common people of every shire, to whom the gentlemen and also their learned clarkes do for the most part condescend, but herein we are already ruled by th' English dictionaries and other bookes written by learned men.”

2. NORTHERN DIALECT.—The following extract from the Early English Psalter, from a MS. written about the middle of the reign of Edward II.,† represents the speech of Yorkshire and Northumberland during the latter half of the thirteenth century:

Laverd,oure Laverd,hou selkouth is Name þine in alle land þis.

From The Pricke of Conscience (ll. 1412-1446), by Richard Rolle de Hampole (died A.D. 1349), written c. 1340 (Northumberland dialect):‡

þe life of þis world es ful unstable,
And ful variand and changeable,
Als es sene in contrarius manere,
By þe times and vedirs and sesons here,
For þe world and worldis life togider
Changes and turnes oft hider and þider,

3. MIDLAND DIALECTS: (1) East Midland.—The following is an example of the East Midland dialect in the year 1120. It is taken from a forged Peterborough Charter, inserted in the Peterborough Chronicle under the year 656:

(Translation.)

Ða seonde ce kyning æfter þone abbode þet he æuestilice scolde to him cumon, and he swa dyde. Ða cwæð se kyning to þan abbode: "La, leof Sæxulf, ic hæve geseond æfter þe for mine sæule þurfe, and ic hit wile þe wæl secgon for whi min brōðor Peada and min leoue freond Oswi ongunnen an mynstre Criste to loue and Sancte Petre. Ða feorde se abbot ham, and ongan to wircene.

Then the king sent after the abbot that he should come to him speedily, and he did so. Then said the king to the abbot, "Lo, dear Sæxulf, I have sent after thee for my soul's need, and I will tell thee well why my brother Peada and my dear friend Oswi began a minster to the glory of Christ and St. Peter. But my brother is gone from this life, as Christ willed it. But I will pray to thee, my dear friend, that they may work diligently in the work, and I will find thee thereto gold and silver, land and goods, and all that thereto behoves." Then went the abbot home, and began to work.

We next give an extract from the writer, who, says Mr. Kington Oliphant,§ more clearly than any other sets before us the growth of the New English, the great work of the twelfth century. The Monk Ormin wrote a metrical paraphrase of the Gospels, with comments of his own, somewhere about the year 1200. . . . He is the last of our English makers who can be said to have drunk from the undefiled Teutonic well. In the course of his lengthy poem (over 20,000 lines) he uses only four or five French words, and his few Latin words are Church phrases known in our land long before the Norman Conquest. On the other hand, he has scores of Scandinavian words, the result of the Norse settlement in our eastern shires three hundred years before his day. His book is the most thoroughly Danish poem ever written in England that has come down to us: many of the words now in our mouths are found for the first time in his pages. He probably lived some few miles north of Nottingham. In his poem we see clearly the transition to the Middle English of Chaucer, Gower, Wycliffe, &c. He uses the new soft ch, and writes sh for the older sc. He softens g into y, as in ezhe = eage = eye; zung = geong = young; he uses that as a demonstrative, and not as a neuter article; he does not inflect the article, in this respect being far ahead of the Kentish writer of 1340. Ormin was the first English writer to put what before a substantive without regard to gender: as, "What man? What woman?" He uses aren for are, as well as beon and sinndenn. Hi wæron with him sometimes becomes þeʒʒ wære, as in the Southern Homilies; while þu wære is turned into þu wass, and ic sceall becomes I shall. Beó is cut down to be, and beon to ben. Ormin was an orthoëpist of Nature's own making, and in his system of spelling we have the first known attempt at orthoëpical reform in the history of our tongue. The principal peculiarities of his orthography consist in a doubling of the consonant whenever it follows a vowel having any sound except that which is now indicated by the annexation of a final e to the single consonant. Thus, pane would be written pan by Orm, but pan, pann; mean, men, but men, menn; pine, pin, but pin, pinn; tune, tun, but tun, tunn. The versification departs from the Anglo-Saxon standard, in wanting alliteration and in possessing a regular metrical flow; and from the Norman-French in wanting rhyme.

In the Handlyng Synne,* a translation by Robert Manning, otherwise known as Robert of Brunne (i.e., Bourne, a village a few miles from Rutland), from a French poem, the Manuel des Péchés, written by William of Waddington about thirty years before, we see foreshadowed more clearly than in any other work the course which English Literature was destined to take. The English poem differs from all its predecessors in its vocabulary, for it contains but a scanty proportion of those Teutonic words which were soon to fall out of use, and a most copious proportion of French words. It was begun about 1303. "The Handlyng Synne shows how the different tides of speech, flowing from Southern, Western, and Northern shires alike, met in the neighbourhood of Rutland, and all helped to shape the New English."†

In the following extract from an anonymous poem, known as The Romance of William and the Werwolf (ll. 3-11), we have an example of the dialect of Shropshire, circ. 1360:

We have now reached the point of time when the English Language, as we have it now, began to assume a fixed form. The three great writers, William Langland, the author of The Vision of Piers Plowman probably, Wycliffe, the reformer and translator of the Bible, and Chaucer, together developed that particular dialect (Midland) which ultimately became the literary form of the language. The interest and importance of the Vision of Piers Plowman depend not only on the excellence of its literary execution, and the insight which it gives us into the inner life of our ancestors, but also on the fact that it is the first composition in which the English spirit and genius are distinctly perceptible. Though written in a dialect, it heralded the speedy advent of the time when, under the lead of Chaucer and Gower, the literary speech assumed a definite form and character. The Vision has come down to us in three texts, written respectively in 1362, 1377, and 1393.* The numerous MSS. of the work in existence show how widely it was circulated.† In one point it possesses for us a peculiar interest, viz., that it is written according to the old alliterative system of versification, being the last important composition written in that style. The author, whoever he was, was evidently connected with the clerical profession, as is indicated by the acquaintance with ecclesiastical literature displayed in the poem. He had an accurate knowledge of the Latin Scriptures, the Treatises of the Fathers, and the works of commentators and expositors.‡ His diction is more archaic than that of Chaucer, but the syntax, structure, and vocabulary present a marked resemblance. The following are the principal points in Langland's grammar:

I. Nouns.—The nominative plural generally ends in -es, sometimes in -s, and occasionally in -g; -is also occurs, as in wittis, and very rarely -us, as in folus. Some few plurals end in -en, as chylderen. A few nouns, such as folk, which were originally neuter, are unchanged in the plural. Some plurals are formed by vowel change, as gees, men, fete (or feet). The genitive singular ends in -es, sometimes corrupted into -is, as cattes, cattis. The genitive plural ends in -en or -ene, as clerken. The dative singular commonly ends in -e, as to bedde.

II. Adjectives.—The distinction between definite and indefinite adjectives is difficult, owing to the irregularity of the alliterative rhythm, and the additions and corruptions of scribes and copyists. Plural adjectives should, and generally do, end in -e, as alle. Very rarely plural adjectives of French origin end in -es. The comparative of heigh is herre; superlative, heests. Adjectives and adverbs ending in -ly, sometimes form their comparatives and superlatives in loker, lokest, as light, lightloker, lightlokest.

III. Pronouns are the same as in Chaucer, but besides sche, the older form heo is used, and besides bei, the older form h (hy). There are also traces of dialectic confusion and admixture in the use of the pronouns; their is denoted by here, her, or hir; them by hem, &c.

IV. Verbs.—The indicative plural ends both in -en and -eth, as geten, conneth. Thus, in Passus, iii. ll. 80-81, we find:

For þese aren men on þis molde : þat moste harme wercheth
To þe pore peple : that parcel-mele biggen.

He sometimes uses a singular verb with a plural noun, especially the verb is or was, as:

Boþe lyf and lyme is lost from my speche. Passus, v. 99.

The abbreviated forms sit (= sitteth), rit (= rideth), halt (= holdeth), and the like, occur in Langland, as in Chaucer.§ The anomalous verbs and negative verbs (such as nam = am not, nelle = will not), adverbs, &c., are much the same as in Chaucer. The past tense of weak verbs which should end in -ede, ends, commonly, in -ed only, both in the singular and plural, as pley-ed, but sometimes the full plural form -eden occurs. In weak verbs, which should form their past tenses in -de or -te, the final e is often dropped. Thus, went for wente. In strong verbs, which should terminate (in the first and third persons singular of the past tense) in a consonant, we often find an e added; thus, I shope for I shop. The plural generally has the correct form, -en, as chosen. In the infinitive mood some verbs are found with the ending -ie or -ye, and final e is sometimes dropped. The present participle ends in -yng, as worchyng, but the ending -inds occurs occasionally; the prefix y- is often found before past participles, sometimes even before past tenses.

The next writer who exercised an important and decided influence in developing the particular dialect which has become the literary form of the English Language is Wyclif, or Wycliffe. John Wycliffe was born at the village of Hipswell, near Richmond, Yorkshire, about 1324, and died at the vicarage of Lutterworth, Leicestershire, in 1384. Besides the version of the Scriptures in his native tongue, Wycliffe was the author of a large number of religious treatises written in English. His great work, the translation of the Bible, is supposed to have been completed about 1380. It was made from the Latin Vulgate. How much of the translation was the work of Wycliffe himself is rather doubtful; it is generally believed that a large portion of the older text (1380) is the work of Hereford, an English ecclesiastic, while the remainder of the Old Testament and the whole of the New Testament are undoubtedly by Wycliffe himself. A revised edition by Purvey was completed about 1390. Chaucer was probably indebted to Wycliffe for much of the wealth and beauty of his diction and orthography. The numerous MSS. of Wycliffe's translation of the Bible prove how widely it was circulated and how popular it became.*

The most important result of Wycliffe's translation was the formation of an English religious dialect, which, without any essential modifications, has remained the language of devotion and of Scriptural translation to this day. It enriched the English Language by the introduction of a large number of words derived either directly from the Latin, or indirectly from the Latin through the Norman-French. By their excellence and extensive circulation the works of Wycliffe contributed greatly to the importance of the East Midland dialect, and thus tended directly to secure for that speech pre-eminence as the standard form of the language. In various peculiarities of speech he differs from Chaucer and Maundeville, and in these we have followed him. The greatest is the Dan-Anglian custom of clipping the prefix to the past participle, as founden, instead of y-founden. He sometimes, although most seldom, clips the ending of the plural of the imperative, as in Herod's request to the wise men:

Whan yee hav founden, telle ayein to me.

He still uses the old sum man for quidam, but this was soon to drop, and to be replaced by a certain man. He corrupts Ormin's pu wass into thou wast. A remnant of the older speech lingers in his nyle ye drede (= fear not). In many points we have preferred Tyndale to Wycliffe, as in "He hath endurid [hardened] the herte;" "Father, clarifie thi name;" "I am sent to evangelise to thee thes thingis," &c. On the other hand, we have preferred Wycliffe to Tyndale in sundry passages, as:

Wycliffe.
Some of perdicoun.
It is good us to be here.
Entre thou in to the joye of thi lord.

Tyndale.
That lost chyde.
Here is good beinge for us.
Go in into thy master's joye, &c.

Few of the words used in the Wycliffite version have become obsolete within the last five hundred years. Hereford, in his portion of the work, strove hard to uphold the Southern dialect. The following is from his version of Psalm ciii.:

7. Knowen he made his weies to Moises; and to the sones of Israel his willis.
8. Reewere and merciful the Lord, long abidende and myche merciful.
9. Into enermore he shal not wrathen, ne into withoute ende he shal threte.
10. Aftir oure synnes he dide not to vs, ne aftir oure wickidnessis he gelde to us.
11. For after the heigte of heuene fro erthe, he strengthide his mercy vpon men dredende him.

The other two translators, on the other hand, leant to the new standard, the East Midland dialect. They wrote daunseresse, &c., where Hereford wrote daunster, &c. They also used -ing as the ending of the present participle, where Hereford wrote the old -ende.†

* Wycliffe's translations, two versions, were edited by Rev. J. Forshall and Sir F. Madden in 1850.

John de Trevisa, from whose translation of Higden's Polychronicon (completed about 1387) the following extract is taken, was a native of Cornwall, but resided chiefly in Gloucestershire, being vicar of Berkeley and chaplain to Thomas, Lord Berkeley.

We have now arrived at the most important point in the history of the English Language. The commencement of literary English dates from the latter half of the fourteenth century, and from the writings of Chaucer and his contemporary, Gower. The language and literature which we have hitherto been considering are dialectic in character, as there was thus far no generally recognized standard of speech, and consequently no national literature. Having reached this important point, the rise of the Queen's English, it may be well, before proceeding further, to notice minutely the precise condition of the language used by Chaucer.

Born in London (c. 1340), Chaucer wrote in the East Midland dialect. This dialect, formed by the blending of Anglian and Danish terms and constructions, had gradually extended farther and farther southward, until it eventually supplanted the original Southern speech. Its complete ascendancy was not, however, established till long after the time of Chaucer. His English, like that of the present day, is an uninflected or analytic language, differing in this respect from the language of his predecessors, and still more from that oldest form of English, known as Anglo-Saxon, which was originally inflected or synthetic, that is to say, it expressed grammatical relation by changes in the forms of words, instead of employing auxiliary words. The additions to the vocabulary of the English Language from the Norman-French formed no inconsiderable element in the written language when Chaucer wrote. He has been accused of corrupting the English Language by an unnecessarily large admixture of Norman-French terms, but in reality he, with few exceptions, employed only such terms as were in use in the spoken language, giving them the stamp of his authority and thus making them current coin of the literary realm. Of the French words found in his writings, few more than one hundred have become obsolete.

With the Canterbury Tales begins the modern period of English Literature. We have seen how Chaucer found the language, the following outline of his grammatical forms will show how he used it, and how he left it:*

I. Nouns.—1. The nominative plural, for the most part, terminated in .es—

And with his stremës dryeth in the grevës

The silver dropës hongyn on the leevës. Knight's Tale, 637, 638.

* Mainly condensed from Dr. Morris's Introduction to Chaucer's Prologue, Knight's Tale, &c. (Clarendon Press, 1875).

In the oldest English there were several plural endings, -as, -an, -n, -a, -o. After the Norman Conquest these were reduced (1) to -es, -en, -e; (2) to -es, -en; and finally the suffix -es or -s became the ordinary plural ending.

Thus -as was originally only the plural sign of one declension of masculine nouns, as fisc, fish, pl. fiscas.* -s is added (1) to nouns terminating in a liquid or dental, as palmer, pilgrims, naciouns, &c.; (2) to short words of one syllable.

Some few nouns (originally forming the plural in -an) have -en, -n, as aschen (= ashes), assen (= asses), yen, yen (= eyes), fleen (= fleas), &c.

Brethren, daughtren, sistren (or sustren), children, fon, foen (= foes) also occur.

Deer, folk, good, hors, trest, scheep, sum, thing, yer, yeer, are unchanged in the plural.

2. The genitive case singular ends in -es, as:

Ful worthi was he in his lordes werre. Prol., 47.

3. The dative case singular occasionally occurs and terminates in -e, as beddē, holtē, &c.

4. The genitive plural is much the same as in Modern English: as, foxēs tales, mennēs wittes, &c.

In Chaucer's time, and even later, we find (1) an inflectional -e to mark the plural number; (2) an inflectional e for the definite adjective—that is, when preceded by a demonstrative pronoun or a possessive pronoun, as:

Whan Zephirus eek with his sweetē breethe
 Enspired hath in every holte and heethe
 The tendrē croppes, and the yongē sonne Hath in the Ram his halfē cours ironne. Prol., 5-9.

II. Adjectives.—As in Modern German adjectives have two forms—definite and indefinite. The definite form preceded by the definite article, a demonstrative adjective, or a possessive pronoun, terminates in -e in all cases of the singular, as “The yongē sonne,” “his halfē cours,” &c. Words of more than one syllable nearly always omit the final -e. The vocative case of the adjective takes this -e; as “Leevē mother,” and “strongē God,” &c. The comparative degree is formed by adding -er (-re) to the positive; and the superlative degree terminates in -este (-est): nest (or next), and hest (= highest) are abbreviated forms. The plural of adjectives is denoted by a final -e, as:

And smalē fowles maken melodie. Prol., 9.

Chaucer has instances of the Norman-French plural -s in such phrases as cosins germains, places delitables.

In Middle English the adjective of Romance origin frequently took a plural termination (-es, -s) when placed after its substantive.

III. The old plural of the definite article tho (A.S. tha) is still used, but the uninflected the is more common. Chaucer never uses that, except as a demonstrative adjective, as in the present stage of the language. The pronouns are:

	Sing.	Plur.	Sing.	Plur.
	NOM. I, ich, ik.	We.	Thou, thow.	Ye.
	GEN. Min (myn) mi (my).	Our, oure.	Thin (thyn), thi (thy).	Your, youre.
DAT. & ACC.	Me.	Us.	The, thee.	Yow, you.
		Sing.		Pl.
	NOM. He.	She.	Hit, it.	Thei, they
	GEN. His.	Hir, hir.	His.	Here (here, hir).
DAT. & ACC.	Him.	Hir, hire, here.	Hit, it.	Hem.

IV. Verbs.—1. The indicative mood is thus inflected—

	Present.			Past.
I	lovē.	We	} lov-en, lov-ē	I lov-ede
Thou	lov-est.	Ye		Thou lov-edest.	We lov-eden, lov-ede.
He	lov-eth.	They		He lov-ede.	They

2. The infinitive mood ends in -en or -e, speken, speke. The -n was dropped at an early period, in the Southern English dialect of the fourteenth century, and -e is preferred to -en.

V. Participles.—1. The present participle usually ends in -yng. The A.S. suffix -ende is used by Gower; but in the Southern dialect of Early English we find -inde (Northern -ande, -and, East Midland -end, -and), which has evidently given rise to -inge, of which -yng is a shorter form.

* When -as became -es, it still remained, for the most part, a distinct syllable, as in the above passage from Chaucer. Traces of this form we have in Elizabethan writers:

Then looking upward to the heaven's heams,
 With nightēs stars thick powder'd everywhere. Sackville: Induction.
 To show his teeth as white as whalēs hone. Shakesp.: Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

2. The past participle of weak verbs terminates in -ed, -d, and occasionally in -et, -t; those of strong verbs in -en, -e. The prefix y- or i- (A.-S. ge-) occurs frequently before the past participle, as ironne (=run), ifalle (=fallen).

Under the guiding influence of Chaucer the language of England at once advanced to that preëminence which it maintains among the languages of Europe. Its vocabulary, hitherto unregulated and fluctuating, was now reduced to order; one form of speech constituted the standard of literary composition, and the age of English literature had fairly begun. Chaucer, in his poems, entirely discarded alliteration, the chief metrical characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon and English poems written before his time, and adopted rime,* and by his influence riming verse was firmly established as an essential element in our poetry. In the North and West of England alliteration was employed as late as the end of the fifteenth century. The Canterbury Tales are, for the most part, written in heroic couplets, or lines containing five accents. In this metre we have ten syllables, but we often find eleven, and occasionally nine. Final -es is a distinct syllable in the genitive singular and the plurals of nouns, and also in adverbs.

The -ed of past participles is generally sounded.

In the past tense of weak verbs ending in -de or -te, the final e is sounded.

Final e is generally sounded, except in the personal pronouns, in many words of more than one syllable, and in words of Romance origin.

The pronunciation of Anglo-Saxon probably resembled that of Latin, placing the stress of the voice (or accent) upon the root, and not upon the inflected syllables.

"The vocabulary of the French language is derived, to a great extent, from Latin words deprived of their terminal inflections. The French adjectives mortal and fatal are formed from the Latin mortalis and fatalis, by dropping the inflected syllable; the French nouns nation and condition, from the Latin [accusatives nationem, conditionem] by rejecting the em final. In most cases the last syllable retained in the French derivatives was prosodically long in the Latin original; and either because it was also accented or because the slight accent which is perceivable in the French articulation represents temporal length, the stress of the voice was laid on the final syllable of all these words. When we borrowed such words from the French, we took them with their native accentuation; and as accent is much stronger in English than in French, the final syllable was doubtless more forcibly enunciated in the former than in the latter language." †

The French accentuation even affected pure English words. Thus we find wisl'iche for wi'sliche, begynnyng', endyng', &c., and Chaucer rhymes gladnes'se with distres'se. As pronounced in Chaucer's time, the letters had probably the following values: a = ah, as in father; c = k before a, o, u, or any consonant, and = s before e, i, or y; e (long) as e in there; e (short) as in German gutë; g, hard in all non-French words, and = j before e or i in words of French origin; i (long) = the lengthened sound of i in still; i (short), as in pin; s was never = sh or zh as at present; sch = sh in shall; u (long) had the sound of French u; u (short) German ü; y (vowel) had the same sound as i; y (consonant) as at present.

From Chaucer's Pardoner's Tale (written c. 1390):

Now for the love of Crist þat for us dyde,
Levith goure othis, boþe gret and smale.
But, sires, now wol I telle forþ my tale.
These riottoures þre, of which I gou telle,
Longe erst þan prime rong of eny belle,
Were set hem in a tavern for to drynke;

And as þey sat[te], þey herd a belle clinke
Bifore a corps, was caried to be grave;
That oon of hem gan calle unto his knave,
"Go bet," quoth he, "and axe redily,
What corps is þat, [þat] passes her forþby;
And loke þou report his name wel."

* There are a few lines on the death of William the Conqueror in the A.S. Chronicle written in rime Robert of Gloucester, Robert de Brunne, Hampole, and others, also wrote in rime.

Chaucer was closely followed by his friend John Gower, of whom he speaks as the "Moral Gower." Gower was born in 1325, was a student of Merton College, Oxford, and died in 1408. In his youth he wrote in French (Speculum Meditantis) and in Latin (Vox Clamantis), but when old he wrote in English, differing little from that of Robert de Brunne, his Confessio Amantis.^{*} His fame rests principally upon the accuracy and precision of his rhyme and vocabulary, which contributed greatly to determine the form of the language. In literary merit he was far inferior to his great contemporary, Chaucer. In his grammar he closely resembles him, except that he clips the prefix -y or -i to the past participle, and tries to keep alive the present participial ending -and, Chaucer preferring the corrupt ending -ing, first seen in Layamon. The Confessio Amantis, from which the following extract is taken, was written in 1393.

Thei knelen alle, and wip o vois,
The king þei þonken of þis chois;
And after þat þei up arise
And gon aside and hem awise;
And ate laste þei acorde (Wherof her tale to recorde

To what issue þei be falle).
A knyght schal speke for hem alle.
He kneleþ doum unto þe king
And seiþ þat þei upon þis þing,
Or for to winne or for to lese,
Ben alle advised for to chese.†

During the first three-quarters of the fifteenth century English Literature declined: the original and creative power of the English mind seems to have disappeared, and much of the literature of this period consists of mere translations or imitations of older models. The names of some seventy poets have come down to us as having written during this dreary period; of these the best known and the most deserving of commendation are Occleve, Lydgate, James I. of Scotland, and Harry the Minstrel. The prose-writers during this period are few in number, and are principally theological. The most notable are Bishop Pecock (1395–1460), author of The Repressor of over much Blaming of the Clergy, written about 1449, and Sir Thomas Malory, compiler of La Morte Darthur, 1469–70. John Lydgate (1373–1460) was ordained a sub-deacon in the Benedictine Monastery of Bury St. Edmunds in 1389, deacon in 1393, and priest in 1397. He is the author of several poems—The Storie of Thebes, The Falls of Princes (from Boccaccio), and The Troy Book—besides numerous minor works. He is remarkable for the great ease and fluency of his language. The following extract from his London Lickpeny is printed here from the Harl. MS. 367:

To London once my stepp[e]s I bent,
Where trouth in no wyse should be faynt,
To-westmynster-ward I forthwith went,
To a man of law to make complaynt;
I sayd, "for marys love, that holy saynt!
Pyty the poore that wolde procede;"
But for lack of mony I cold not spede.

And as I thrust the prese amonge,
By froward chaunce my hood was gone,
Yet for all that I stayd not longe,
Tyll to the kynges bench I was come.
Before the Judge I kneled anon,
And prayd hym for god's sake to take heede;
But for lack of mony I myghte not speede.

As a specimen of the Norfolk dialect of the middle of the fifteenth century, we give here a letter written by Sir John Fastolf to Sir Thomas Howys and William Barber:*

To my ryght trusty freende, Sir Thomas Howys, Parson of Castillcombe, beyng at Castre, and William Barber, in haste, at Castre In, by Yermuth [Yarmouth].

In 1477 the art of Printing was introduced into England by William Caxton (1422–1491), who established his press in the almonry of Westminster Abbey. This art at first acted as a disturbing element upon the language, and tended to augment the existing disorder, but in the end it essentially promoted orthoëpical and orthographical consistency, uniformity of speech, and elegance in literary composition.

Caxton had passed many years of his life abroad, and the early productions of his press were, for the most part, translations from the French. As a consequence, his style is pervaded by Gallicisms, both in vocabulary and in structure, and a very large number of French words and idioms was introduced by him. Moreover, Caxton (as indeed every printer), having no uniform standard of orthography, reduced the orthography of the authors printed by him to an arbitrary standard of his own devising, and thus the sanction of authority being given to numerous anomalies and diversities of spelling, considerable confusion and discrepancy resulted. But though at first the cause of this confusion, the art of printing, when once its real character and importance were clearly apprehended, exercised the most potent effect upon our tongue by dispelling the prevailing rudeness, by facilitating elegance and harmony of style, and by promoting uniformity and regularity of speech. The multiplication of books and readers tended to assimilate the various dialects to the Southern, or the speech of the capital and of the southern counties, and the dialect of books superseded local forms and provincial usages, except amongst the uneducated classes.

In Caxton's first work we see the loss of the old Southern inflections of the verb; and we find Ormin's their, them, and that (iste) well established, instead of the Southern her, hem, and thilk employed by Pecoek. Plural adjectives no longer end in -s: thus we have strange habitacions in the first page of the Recuyell of the Historyes of Troye. The old form that oon . . . that other (in Latin alter . . . alter) comes once more. In the Game of the Chesse, published in 1474, we find ner for the Latin neque, an odd mixture of the Southern ne with the North-Western corruption nor. The hard g is seen once more, as in agayn, driving out the usurper y. †

There are upwards of twenty-two folio volumes printed by Caxton, which he had himself translated from French, Dutch, or Latin originals. Between 1523 and 1525 Lord Berners (1464–1532) translated Froissart's Chronicles. Of this work Mr. Marsh says: "This translation is doubtless the best English prose style which had yet appeared, and, as a specimen of picturesque narrative, it is excelled by no production of later periods.* The extract is from the description of the Battle of Crécy, ch. cxxx.:

Also the same season there fell a great rayne and a clype, with a terryble thunder; and before the rayne, there came fleying ouer to the batayls a great nombre of crowes, for feare of the tempest commynge. Than anone the eyre begaune to waxe clere, and the sonne to shyne fayre and bright: this which was right in the frenchmens eyen, and in the englysshmens backes. When the genoways were assembled togyuder and beganne to aproche, they made a great leape and crye to abashe the englysshmen, but they stode styll and styrrde nat for all that.

The next important production of this era—one which has exerted a more decided influence upon the English tongue than any other native work between the eras of Chaucer and Shakespeare—is William Tyndale's Translation of the New Testament, first printed in 1525. Tyndale was born about 1477, and was burnt for heresy at Antwerp in October, 1536. His translation of the New Testament is one of the finest works in our language, and the present Authorised Version owes very much to it. We give here his translation of Matthew v. 16–19:

16. Se that youre light so shyne before men, that they maye see youre good workes, and glorify youre father which is in heven.

17. Ye shall not thynke that I am come to disannull the lawe, or the prophets; no I am nott come to disannull them, but to fulfyll them.

18. For truely I say vnto you, till heven and erth perisshe, one iott, or one tytle, shall not scape tyll all be fulfilled.

19. Whosoever breaketh one of these lest comandementes, and shall teache men so, he shalbe called the leest in the kyngdome off heven; but whosoever shall observe, and teache them, that persone shalbe called greate in the kyngdome of heven.

Tyndale's great opponent, Sir Thomas More, was born in London in 1480; educated at Oxford, appointed Lord Chancellor October 25, 1529, and beheaded, on a charge of high treason, July 6, 1535. His most famous work was his Utopia, written in Latin, and printed in 1516. In the following extract † he charges Tyndale with not observing aright the distinction between no and nay; but, curiously enough, he misstates his own rule.

I woulde not here note by the way, that Tyndal here translath no for nay, for it is but a trifle and mistaking of the englishe worde: saning that ye shoulde see that he whych in two so plain englishe wordes, and so comen as is naye and no, can not tell when he should take the tone, and when the tother, is not for translating into englishe, a man very mete. For the vse of those two wordes in aunswerring to a question is this, No ‡ aunswereth the question framed by the affirmatiue. As for ensample, if a manne should aske Tindall hymselfe: "ys an heretike mete to translate holy scripture into englishe?" Lo, to thys question, if he will aunswere trow englishe, he muste aunswere nay and not no. But and if this question be asked hym thus, lo: "Is not an heretyque mete to translate holy scripture into english?" To this question, lo, if he wil aunswer true english, he must aunswere no and not nay. And a lyke difference is there betweene these two adverbs, ye and yes. For if the questeion bee framed vnto Tindall by thaffirmatiue in thys fashion: "If an heretique falsly translate the newe testament into englishe, to make hys false heresyse seeme the worde of Godde, be hys bookes worthy to be burned?" To this question asked in thys wyse, yff he wil sunswere true englishe, he must aunswere ye and not yes. But nowe if the question be asked hym thus, lo, by the negatiue: "If an heretike falsly translate the newe testament in-to englishe, to make hys false heresyse seme the word of God, be not his bokes well worthy to be burned?" To thys question in thys fashion framed, if he wyll aunswere trow englyshe, he maye not aunswere ye, but he must sunswere yes, and say, "Yes, mary, be they, bothe the traslacion and the traslatour, and al that wyll holde wyth them."

Sir Thomas Wiat (or Wyatt), § called the Elder, to distinguish him from his son, was born in 1503, and died in 1542. In his songs he imitated Surrey, but he is chiefly remarkable as being the first writer of English Satires, of which three have been preserved. ||

The next author from whom we quote is Hugh Latimer, Bishop of Worcester. He was born in Leicestershire in 1491, and was burnt with Bishop Ridley at Oxford, October 16, 1555. His sermons were very popular, the most notable of all being that known as the Sermon on the Ploughers, preached at St. Paul's, January 18, 1548-9.*

And wel may the preacher and the ploughman be ykened together. Fyrste for their labour of all ceasons of the yere. For there is no tyme of the yere, in whiche the ploughman hath not some special worke to do, as in my countrey in Leicestre Shire, the ploughe man hath a tyme to set furth and to affaie hya plough, and other tymes for other necessarie workes to be done. And then they also maye be likenede together, for the diuersitie of workes and varietie of offices yat they haue to do. For as the ploughman firste setteth furth hys plough and then tilleth hys lande and breaketh it in furrourges, and sometime ridgeth it vp agayne. And at an other tyme harroweth it, and clotteth it, and sometyme doungeth it, and hedgeth it, diggeth it, and weedeth it, pourgeth and maketh it cleane. So the prelate, the preacher hath mani diuers offices to do.

Nicholas Udall was born in Hampshire about 1504, and died at Westminster in 1556, having been master of Westminster School in that and the preceding year. He published a translation of the third and fourth books of the Apophthegms of Erasmus, and also assisted in translating Erasmus' Paraphrase of the New Testament, but he is chiefly noted for his comedy of Roister Doister, the earliest English play extant, written before 1553. It is divided into acts and scenes, and is a fair specimen of comedy.

Thomas Sackville, first Lord Buckhurst and Earl of Dorset (1536-1608), is best known as the author of the tragedy of Gorboduc, otherwise called Ferrex and Porrex. He also planned The Mirrour for Magistrates, a collection of narratives by several poets on the misfortunes of the great men in English history, and contributed to it "The Induction," or poetical preface, and "The Complaint of the Duke of Buckingham."

In 1545 appeared the Toxophilus of Roger Ascham (1515-1568), tutor to Queen Elizabeth, and Latin Secretary to Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth, successively. His greatest work is The Schoolmaster, published posthumously by his widow in 1570, and again in 1571.

The chief and best work of George Gascoigne (1525-1577) is the Steel Glas, written in 1576. The Steel Glas is, in fact, a mirror, in which the poet sees a reflection of various estates of men, whom he describes with severe exactness and some fine satirical touches.

In Spenser's (c. 1550-1598) Faery Queene, we seem to be transported back to archaic times. He had an affinity for those olden turns of expression, those inflections, which were dying out, and which give the Faery Queene at first sight the appearance of having been written in an obsolete dialect. Without any intention of writing in obsolete English, he looked always backwards, never forwards, in his choice of words and phrases. But his use of archaisms degenerated into affectation, so that even men of his own age thought his style too antique. Daniel † says of him:

"Let other men sing of knights and palladines
In aged accents and untimely words."

He reverted to the old system of alliteration, of which he seems to have been particularly fond. His stanza is said to be a modification of the ottava rima of Ariosto. To illustrate the archaisms of the Faery Queene, the following examples will suffice:

In constructions, the impersonal verb is used without the usual pronoun before it: sits not = "it sita not," seemed = "it seemed," and the like, occur very frequently: or again, the use of the double negative, ne can no man: or should have for "would have" as should beare for "would have borne." As to forms or inflexions, we may notice among parts of verbs the past participle ydrad = dreaded,

* From Arber's Reprints, 1868, p. 19.

† Sonnet cxi.

ycladd = clad, troden = trodden, wozen, past participle of "to wax;" the preterite lad = led; wot, preterite of "to weet;" raft of "to reave" = to bereave; can = gan = began; raught = reached; brast = burst. Again, we find bene, been, for the modern "are;" mote = might; and a variety of similar forms. Trenchand, glitterand, are present participles. There are also old plurals of nouns, as foen = foes, eyne or eyen = eyes.*

The Faery Queene affords instances of a large number of words in process of transition or assimilation from the French into our own tongue. Thus in the edition of 1590 occurs ferse, in 1596 fierce; perse, persaunt are nearer the French origin than pierce, piercing; richesse, noblesse, humblesse, are words not yet digested by our language; renverst, esloyne, covetise, pourtrahed, journal (for "daily"), are all French forms; insúpportable, envý, spirituall, the tigré cruel, are all in pronunciation nearer the French than the English.

There are also numerous Latinisms and imitations from the Italian throughout the poem. Spenser's other poetical works are The Shepheard's Calender (1579), Astrophel (1586), Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1592), Mother Hubbard's Tale (1590), Epithalamium (1594), &c.; and in prose the View of the Present State of Ireland (1598).

Behold I see the haven nigh at hand,
To which I meane my wearie course to bend;
Vere the maine shete, and beare up with the land,
The which afore is fairely to be kend,
And seemeth safe from storms, that may offend :

There this faire virgin wearie of her way
Must landed be, now at her journeyes end :
There eke my feeble barke a while may stay,
Till merry wind and weather call her thence away.
Faery Queene, I. xii. 1.

With the above quotation this sketch of the English Language naturally closes. After some five centuries of struggle and vicissitude a standard literary language had at last been formed. Ever growing, ever spreading, taking in its vocabulary words from every source changing, though almost imperceptibly, the English Language, with its magnificent store, of literature, has become the language of hundreds of millions. And yet it is comparatively neglected; only of late years has the attention which it deserves been paid to it. English has been passed over, and been considered useless or undeserving of being taught in our schools, while all attention has been given to the Classical Languages.

"It is quite certain" (says Professor Skeat) "that the reason why the study of Anglo-Saxon is so strangely neglected among us is simply that it has never had a trial, nor has ever had even the chance of a trial. The most extraordinary misconception concerning it, and even prejudices against it, are so widely prevalent that we cannot wonder at the tendency to set aside and ignore it. Hence the curious result that, while it does not flourish in its native home, we find German periodicals in existence which are mainly devoted to it, while I am informed that in America the students of Anglo-Saxon are to be counted, not as here by tens, but by hundreds. Whilst we English are proud of our country, of our history, of our conquests, of our empire, we have for centuries looked down upon the main stock of our own noble language as if that, at any rate, is insignificant. Or, if we acknowledge the beauty and force of our language, we are seldom led on duly to consider its history. A moment's reflection will tell us that the historical method of study is the only rational one; and yet we are accustomed—which is the strangest thing of all—to treat one part of our language historically, and not the other. If a word come to us from the Latin or Greek we are expected, as scholars, to explain it; but as to the words that come to us from the Anglo-Saxon or the Old French, it is usual to treat them as being either, on the one hand, beneath notice, or as being, on the other hand, inscrutable. The fault lies simply in the establishment of a customary and short-sighted prejudice that has shut out English from its proper place in the school-boy's course of study. Boys are taught how to use Latin and Greek dictionaries, but they are not allowed to see an Anglo-Saxon dictionary; nor, if they saw one, could they find their place in it without help. To learn all the letters of the Greek alphabet comes to most boys as a matter of course; but to learn the three or four so-called Anglo-Saxon letters which present a trifling difficulty by their unusual forms, is often regarded as involving some severe effort." †

ENGLISH LEXICOGRAPHY.

THE first English-Latin Dictionary was the Promptorium Parvulorum sive Clericorum, compiled by Geoffrey, a Norfolk grammarian. It exists in several manuscripts, dating from about the year 1440. It was printed by Pynson in 1499, by Julian Notary in 1508, and by Wynkyn de Worde in 1510, 1512, 1516, and 1528. In 1843 the first part was reprinted by the Camden Society, under the editorship of the late Mr. Albert Way, a scholar peculiarly fitted for the task. The work, extending to 563 pages, was not completed till 1865. In it references are made to several existing glossaries, some of which have been identified, notably the Dictionarius of John De Garlandia.* The earliest Latin-English Dictionary known is that entitled Medulla Grammaticæ (or Grammatices), which, in the opinion of Mr. Way, was probably compiled by the author of the Promptorium. The earliest MS. known of this work dates about 1460, but there are several later copies.† The Ortus Vocabulorum, based in a great measure on the Medulla, was the first Latin-English Dictionary printed in this country, the first edition being from the press of Wynkyn de Worde in 1500, and other editions appearing in 1508, 1509, 1511, 1514, 1516, 1518, 1528, 1532, 1533, and 1539.‡ These numerous editions testify to the popularity of the work. After the Promptorium Parvulorum, the next English-Latin Dictionary is the Catholicon Anglicum, a work specially valuable as being the first dated dictionary. From the colophon we learn that it was compiled, or rather completed, in 1483. It exists only in two MSS.: the earlier (add. MS. 15562), assigned by the authorities of the British Museum to about 1475, which is imperfect, and the later, dated, as said above, 1483, which is perfect. From this later copy the MS. was edited, with notes and annotations, for the Camden and Early English Text Societies in 1881, some four hundred years after its compilation.

The next most noticeable Dictionary is Palsgrave's Lesclaircissement de la Langue Francoyse, printed in 1530, a work of incalculable value, written in English-French, and reprinted in 1852.

The Vulgaria of William Horman, Head-Master and Vice-Provost of Eton (died 1535), was printed for the first time by Pynson in 1519,§ in small quarto, and reprinted for the first and last time by Wynkyn de Worde in 1530.|| It is a valuable and interesting work, full of quaint sentences and phrases in English-Latin.

Wyllyam Salesbury's Dictionarie in Englysche and Welshe appeared in 1547

The Abecedarium Anglico-Latinum pro Tyrunculis of Richard Huloet appeared in 1552, and a new edition, greatly enlarged, with the addition of the French and many phrases, chiefly from Thierry's French and Latin Dictionary, was published by John Higgins, and printed by Thomas Marsh in 1572. It is dedicated to Sir George Peckam. Huloet was the first to adopt the true method of forming a trustworthy Dictionary. He writes: "For the better attayning of the knowledge of words I went not to the common Dictionaries only, but also to the authors themselves . . . and finally, I wrote not in the whole booke one quyre without perusing and conference of many authors."

Next in order comes J. Withal's Shorte Dictionarie in Latin and English verie profitable for yong Beginners, a title changed in later editions to A Dictionary in English and Latine: Devised for the capacitie of Children and young Beginners. It is rather a vocabulary than a dictionary. The first edition, undated, has as its colophon: "Imprinted by the late house of William Caxton" by Wynkyn de Worde. This work was very popular, and was reprinted in 1554, 1559, 1567, 1572, 1594, 1599, and 1634. The running title is A litle Dictionarie for Children. In the edition of 1634 is mentioned "A greene or grassy banke, that they call by London, Primrose hill."

In 1570 appeared the English-Latin Dictionary of Peter Levins (or Levens), known as Manipulus Vocabulorum, A Dictionarie of English and Latin wordes set forthe in suche order as none heretofore hath ben . . . necessary not onely for Schollers that want variety of Words, but also for such as use to write in English meetre.* This work is noticeable as being the first riming Dictionary.

In 1573 John Baret published his Alvearie, written in English, Latin, French, and Greek, the last being at times omitted for the simple reason given by Baret himself: "As for Greeke, I coulde not ioyne it with every Latin word, for lacke of fit Greeke letters, the printer not having leasure to provide the same."

John Florio, teacher of French and Italian at Oxford, and afterwards tutor to Prince Henry, son of James I., published in 1598 his Italian-English Dictionary, to which an English-Italian part was added by Giovanni Torriano, a fellow-teacher; and in 1611 Randle Cotgrave printed his English and French Dictionary, or Bundle of Words, as he terms it in his preface. It is a most valuable work to the students of obsolete language. In 1632 it received the desirable addition of an English-French Dictionary by Robert Sherwood. A French grammar is appended.

John Bullokar's diminutive Dictionary of "hard" words appeared in 1616, and is noticeable as being the first Dictionary in which the English words are explained by English. It was followed in 1617 (in its full form, the first edition having appeared in 1599) by John Minsheu's folio, the title of which is in Latin and English, the latter reading, The Guide into the Tongues, and which professes to give the "agreement and consent one with another, as also their Etymologies, that is, the Reasons and Derivations of all or the most part of words in these nine Languages, viz.:

- | | | |
|----------------|-------------|-----------------|
| 1. English, | 4. French, | 7. Latine, |
| 2. Low Dutch, | 5. Italian, | 8. Greeke, |
| 3. High Dutch, | 6. Spanish, | 9. Hebrew, &c." |

In the original edition the Spanish is placed first, in later editions the English.

Henry Cockeram published his Dictionary in 1623. It is a small volume, by which he hoped to teach "Ladies and Gentlewomen, young schollers, clarkes, merchants, as also strangers of any nation," who were desirous of "a refined and elegant speech" to take his work as an "Alphabetically and English Expositor" of "vulgar words," "mocke words," "fustian termes . . . ridiculously used in our language," so that by looking into his Expositor they might "receive the exact and ample word to expresse" their meaning.

* Reprinted for the Early English Text Society in 1867, under the editorship of Mr. Henry B. Wheatley.

Accordingly, he tells us that rude is vulgar, and agresticall the proper word to be used for it, or rusticall, immorigerous, ruvall; also, that to weede is vulgar, and the choice word to sarculate, to diruncinate, to averuncate.

In 1656 Thomas Blount published his little octavo Dictionary entitled Glossographia, written, as he says, "for all such as desire to understand what they read," and so save them from being, as he was, "often gravell'd" by hard words. Two years later Edward Phillips, nephew of Milton, published his folio New World of Words, or, a General English Dictionary . . . A Work very necessary for Strangers, as well as our own Countrymen, or for all persons that would rightly understand what they discourse, write, or read. This work is little else than a copy of Blount's Glossographia, blunders and all, with many blunders added, and is therefore of little use to the student. A third edition of it was published in 1671, and a fourth in 1678. Kersey added some 20,000 words to it in 1706. The blunders in it were mercilessly shown up by Blount in his World of Errors discovered in the New World of Words, &c., 1673.

An anonymous Dictionary, entitled Glossographia Anglicana Nova, appeared in 1707. The bulky folio of Dr. Stephen Skinner was published in 1671, containing elaborate explanations of English words in Latin. It is especially noticeable for the number of fictitious Anglo-Saxon words which he invented to stand as etymologies for English words. It, in company with the Etymologicon Anglicanum of Junius, was used by Dr. Johnson for his etymologies.

Nathan Bailey's Universal Etymological English Dictionary first appeared in 1721. His work, originally in octavo, with woodcuts, was reprinted time after time, both in octavo and folio, with and without woodcuts. It contained words current as well as obsolete, easy as well as hard, scientific and dialectic. A folio copy, interleaved, was the foundation of Dr. Johnson's famous Dictionary. Bailey's etymologies are mostly taken from Minsheu and Spelman. To jeopard he derives from the French j'ai perdu = I have lost all. A guest he defines as "a person invited to, or received at a feast; a stranger who lodges with one the second night" The work is interspersed with proverbs, as: "As sure as God's in Gloucestershire. This proverb is said to have its rise, on account that there are more rich and mitred abbeys in that, than in any two shires in England besides; but some, from William of Malmesbury, refer it to the fruitfulness of it in religion, in that it is said to have returned the seed of the Gospel with the increase of an hundredfold." Bailey's work remained the standard for thirty years.

Passing over Kersey, Dyche, Defoe, Sparrow, Pardon, and Martin, we come to the well-known name of John Wesley, whose Complete English Dictionary was published first in 1753, and again in 1764 and 1765. In his preface "to the Reader" he writes: "Many are the mistakes in all the other English dictionaries which I have seen. Whereas I can truly say, I yet know of none in this; and I conceive the reader will believe me, for if I had, I should not have left it there. Use then this help, till you find a better." Some of his definitions are not very clear or simple: as, for instance, "An abscess, an imposthume;" "An ortolan, a very dear bird." Others are interesting: as, "The Elect, all that truly believe in Christ;" "A Puritan, an old strict Church of England man;" "Quietists, who place all religion in waiting quietly on God;" "A Methodist, one that lives according to the Method of the Bible."

Next comes the great folio Dictionary of Dr. Samuel Johnson, which is too well-known to require much comment here. It appeared first in 1755, and was a laborious undertaking. Johnson's task was far more difficult than that of any of his numerous successors. The vocabularies ready to his hand were so meagre, that he had to raise his stupendous pile almost from the foundation. His great work has formed the foundation and starting-point of all his successors, whose task has to a great extent been to modify and add to his central pile to suit modern conditions. The folios are exceedingly valuable for their wealth of quotations. An American reviewer says:

"It has been often said, and truly enough, that the merits of Johnson's dictionary have been overrated. The merits of that which is best in its department will always be popularly overrated; and Johnson's dictionary certainly does not possess the uniform excellence which has sometimes been ascribed to it. But that work was not only for a long period relatively the best of its kind, it was, absolutely, a production of wonderful ability, and there are, in the whole range of modern literature, few achievements of a single intellect which exhibit such conclusive evidence of great learning, great genius, sound judgment and conscientious industry. . . . When we consider the state and tendencies of the language in his time, the little sound learning that then existed respecting the true character and early history of the English tongue, and the other unfavorable circumstances under which his task was performed, it seems truly surprising that he should have accomplished so much; and we may say that though the merits of the dictionary may have been overrated, those of the lexicographer hardly can be."

It might be well to end our review of the progress of English Lexicography at this point, since the Dictionaries which followed Johnson were either revised editions of his, or were based on his as their model. They are of every degree of merit and demerit; some—like that of Dr. Ash (1775)—principally notable for their errors; some, great improvements upon their exemplar. Of those of English origin, the most important are Todd's revised edition of Johnson, and Richardson's Dictionary, the latter valuable as a storehouse of quotations. Of American Dictionaries, it will suffice to name the monumental works of Webster and Worcester, whose characteristics are too well known to need any remarks here concerning them.

The recent and most prolific idea in Dictionary making is to obtain the collaboration of a considerable number of specialists, each an authority in the field of work committed to his care. Of the Dictionaries produced in this manner may be named the Century and the Standard, of American origin, and Murray's and the Encyclopædic Dictionary, of English origin; the last named being particularly valuable from the vast amount of encyclopædic information which it adds to its fullness as a Dictionary of English speech.

Mention should be made here of Prof. Skeat's Etymological Dictionary of the English Language, a work of the highest value, and which has been freely used in the preparation of the present work. In conclusion it may be said, that within the present century the Dictionaries of the English language have been supplemented with a large number of glossaries of words, phrases, slang terms, dialects, rhyming words, and synonyms, and Dictionaries of Theology, Law, Medicine, Science, &c., the whole forming a sum of verbal information of extraordinary completeness and value.

SCRIPTURE AND CLASSICAL PROPER NAMES.

ON THE PRONUNCIATION OF SCRIPTURE AND CLASSICAL PROPER NAMES, WITH SOME GENERAL DIRECTIONS FOR THE PRONUNCIATION OF GREEK AND LATIN.

THE plan adopted in printing these lists has been (1) to divide the proper names into syllables by the usual hyphen sign (-); and (2) to mark the accent (´). The only diacritical mark employed in the List of Proper Names is the macrotone (˘). In the list of quotations the Greek is printed in its proper type, the English transliterations being added within parentheses, as in the body of the work. In the Latin quotations vowels long by nature are so marked (ē), except in the cases where their position would show them to be long [p. 5310]; and contractions are indicated by a circumflex accent (ˆ), as virūm, for virōrum.

I. SCRIPTURE NAMES.

The names in this list are chiefly from the Hebrew, some from the Greek, and a few from the Latin. The pronunciation of Hebrew is a question of great uncertainty, and even among the Jews who use dialectal forms of it two schools of pronunciation exist—the German and the Spanish. In England and America the ordinary value is given to the letters, except to g, which is hard, as in Gilead, Gilgal, Bethphage being the sole instance in which it has the sound of English j; so that if the long vowel mark (if any) and the position of the accent be duly noted there can be no difficulty as to the pronunciation of any of these words. Thus, in A´-bel Mā´-im, the hyphen shows the division into syllables, the macrotone (˘) marks the long vowels, and the omission of any diacritical mark over e and i shows that these letters have their ordinary English value.

II. GREEK.

It is well-nigh impossible for us in the nineteenth century to determine with any certainty the original pronunciation of Greek words and names. We have neither trustworthy record nor unbroken tradition to help us. The study of Greek fell into disrepute with the decline of the Roman Empire, and, indeed, was not revived in Europe until the fifteenth century. At that time a perfectly arbitrary value was assigned to each letter in the Greek alphabet. At the beginning of the sixteenth century Greek pronunciation had assumed a curious phase. Only two sounds were given to all the Greek vowels and diphthongs, whether long or short; v was pronounced as v and κ as ch, so that κενταύριος was pronounced chentafris. About 1540 a reaction took place against this method, and after a struggle the principle of pronouncing Greek as though it were English was accepted. For us the question of Greek pronunciation is further complicated by the fact that the Greek alphabet differs entirely from the Roman, which has generally been adopted in the modern languages of Europe. A Greek word therefore before it becomes Anglicised must be transliterated; that is to say, the symbols used in Greek to represent certain sounds must be replaced by those symbols which seem to us to represent similar sounds in English. This transliteration is a matter of great difficulty, and it can scarcely be said that it has been carried out in English with care or consistency. Had we been left to follow our own judgment, no doubt we should have been more successful, but, as our first acquaintance with the history and literature of Greece came from Latin authors, we accepted the method of transliterating Greek words which they adopted. This drove us into many obvious and indisputable errors, of which a typical example may be quoted here. The guttural k is always hard in Greek, but in pronouncing the name Alcibiades it is customary to sound the c soft in accordance with the English usage. Now, had we transliterated the name direct from Greek, there is little doubt, as there is no c in Greek, that we should have spelt it Alkibiades, and pronounced the k hard; but we got the name Alcibiades from the Latin, in which language the Greek k was always transliterated to c, and then gave the Latin c the soft sound of the English c. This is only a typical instance of the way in which Greek names have been dealt with in English. A cursory glance at the pages of Grote's History of Greece shows us that the result of transliterating Greek words directly into English, instead of through the medium of Latin, is to make them unintelligible to the English reader.

The rule almost universally adopted in pronouncing Greek names in English is to give each letter the sound it has in English, taking care to pronounce all final as well as medial vowels—e.g., Mer'-o-pe is a trisyllable, not a disyllable as it would be in English. It must also be remembered that vowels naturally long in Greek are pronounced long in English, while those that are naturally short are pronounced short. Thus An-tíg'-ò-nē must never be pronounced An-tí-gōne.

Greek vowel.	English sound.	Greek vowel.	English sound.
Α, α . . .	As a in fâte .	Ι, ι . . .	As i in pîn .
Α, ᾶ . . .	As a in fât .	Ο, ο . . .	As o in nôt .
Ε, ε . . .	As e in wêt .	Ω, ω . . .	As o in nôte .
Η, η . . .	As ee in seên .	Υ, υ . . .	As u in cûbe .
Ι, ῖ . . .	As i in pîne .	Υ, ῦ . . .	As u in cûb .

The Greek diphthongs are pronounced precisely like similar combinations in English. The only one which presents any difficulty is ui, and this is pronounced as whi in whine.

The Greek simple consonants are all of them pronounced as the corresponding consonants in English, while the compound consonants φ, θ, χ, and ψ are pronounced as ph, th, ch, and ps respectively. Ζ is pronounced as dz, and γ is always hard except before γ, κ, ξ, and χ, when it is sounded as n.

The pronunciation of Greek as set forth above, although it is universally adopted in England, is absolutely indefensible from the point of view of accuracy. It has, however, received the sanction of many generations, and is not likely to be readily set aside.

It is a matter of the utmost difficulty to arrive at anything like a certain view of the pronunciation adopted by the ancient Greeks themselves. The following general statements are all that can be ventured upon. The vowels had the same value as the vowels in Latin and modern Italian, except that υ whether long or short, was pronounced like the French u or the German ü. The consonants in Greek were similar to the consonants in English, except that γ, unlike our g, was always hard, and that in Greek there was nothing to correspond to the English soft c, which has proved such a stumbling-block in the way of the pronunciation of Greek and Latin. The double consonants φ, θ, and χ were, no doubt, pronounced as two distinct consonants; thus, φ = p-h, θ = t-h, and χ = k-h. Of the diphthongs little can be said with any confidence. In modern Greek they have all approximated to one uniform sound, but this was emphatically not the case in ancient Greek. In all probability each vowel in the diphthong was pronounced separately and distinctly.

III. LATIN.

The pronunciation of Latin rests upon surer ground. In the first place, there is not the difficulty of transliteration to contend with; in the second, the modern languages derived from Latin afford us more evidence as to the ancient language than is the case with Greek. At the outset it must be explained that the custom in English has been to disregard the obvious facts of the case, and pronounce Latin as though it were English. There is, however, in the present day a consensus of opinion against this practice, and the conclusions to which modern scholars have come as to the pronunciation of Latin are briefly stated here.

VOWELS.

- a*, as a in father; never as in fâte.
- â*, as the same sound shortened; never as in fat.
- ê*, as â in English stâte.
- è*, as e in mêt.
- î*, as i in machîne.
- ï*, as i in pîn.
- ô*, between aw in brâw and o in hôme.
- ò*, as o in nôt.
- û*, as oo in foôl; never as u in cûbe.
- ü*, as u in fûll; never as u in bût.
- y*, as German ü. It only occurs in Greek words transliterated into Latin.

The rule for the pronunciation of diphthongs is to pronounce the constituent vowels with as much rapidity as possible, so that they are run together.

- ae*, as the â in German.
- au*, as au in German haus; i.e., as the ou in English house, only broader.
- ei*, as ei in English skéin, rêin.
- eu*, as eu in Modern Italian.
- ui*, a rare combination in Latin, as in French oui.

CONSONANTS.

- c*, always hard in Latin, never soft, as it so often is in English; e.g., Cicero should be pronounced Kikero.
- g*, always hard, as in gate; never soft, as in gentle.
- n*, before c and g, as ng; e.g., incedit is pronounced ingkedît.
- ng*, as in an-ger, not as in hang-er.
- j*, as y in year.
- v*, as w in wine.
- r* must always be trilled, whether in the middle or at the end of a word; e.g., per must be pronounced as the perr in per-ry.
- s*, always sharp, as in hiss; never as in his: e.g., dens is pronounced dense.
- bs*, as ps.
- ti* before a vowel has its proper sound, and is never pronounced sh, as in English.
- ph*, ch, th, were not pronounced as one sound, as in English, but as p-h, k-h, and t-h.

In the table given above those consonants only are set down the pronunciation of which differs from that to which English people are accustomed. The consonants omitted in the list are pronounced in Latin precisely as in English.

QUANTITY.

Every vowel in Latin is either long or short, according as the voice dwells upon it or not. In pronouncing Latin a distinction must always be made between long and short vowels. For instance, we should say â-mo, not êh-mo.

The quantity of a vowel in Latin is influenced by two considerations: 1. By position; 2. By the natural length of the vowel.

1. Position.—(1) A vowel followed by another vowel, or by h and a vowel is short; e.g., mĕus, mĭhi, prĕcĕstus. (2) A vowel followed by two consonants, or by x or z, is long; e.g., amĕnt, strĭx. To this rule there is the following exception: if a short vowel is followed by two consonants, the first of which is a mute, or f, and the second a liquid, the vowel may be treated as either short or long; e.g., tenĕbrae, volūcris, &c. In English it has long been the custom to pronounce a vowel followed by two consonants as though it were short. Thus, it is usual to say amĕns, infĕnsus, &c. This, however, is incorrect. As far as verse-making is concerned, every vowel followed by two consonants in Latin is treated as long, but in pronunciation some vowels followed by two consonants are pronounced long, some short. Thus we say ĕs-tis, but rĕc-tus. The following brief rules will prove a rough guide in this matter. A vowel was always pronounced long before the combinations ns, nf, gn; e.g., amĕns, infĕnsus, signum; also before x, ct, ps, and pt, when these combinations come from gs, gt, bs, bt, respectively; e.g., rĕxi, rĕctus, scripsi, scriptum.

2. Natural length of the vowel.—The following rules determine the natural length of a vowel, unaffected by position.

(1) Vowels not in the final syllable. No rule can be laid down for the natural quantity of root vowels, each root must be studied separately; but there are certain cases in which vowels are known to be long: (a) All diphthongs are long; e.g., pāucāe, cōēpi, except before another vowel, the diphthong sometimes becomes short by position. (See I. (1).) (b) All vowels, which have resulted from the contraction of two separate syllables are long; e.g., cōge (for cōggo). (2) For the quantity of vowels in the final syllable, there are certain general rules, but these admit of many exceptions, which cannot be systematically arranged without discussing the subject of Latin inflexions. Generally speaking (a) Monosyllables are long, e.g., pĕs, mōs; (b) when the word ends with a vowel, a (except as an ending of the ablative case) and e final are short, musĭ, Carthaginĕ; ĭ, o, u final are long, domini, amō, genū; (c) when the word ends with a single consonant the final syllable is short, e.g., amĕt, urbĭs; except that, a, o, e before s are long, e.g., amās, deōs, urbĕs. To all these rules there are many exceptions, which, however, scarcely affect the pronunciation of proper names.

ELISION.

Where a word ending in a vowel or a vowel followed by m preceded a word beginning with a vowel or h, the final vowel or vowel with m was disregarded for the purposes of scansion. This final syllable was not, however, altogether lost in pronunciation, but sounded lightly, the voice hardly dwelling on it at all.

The accent in Latin differed entirely from the accent in English, which may be defined as an emphasis laid on a certain syllable, while the Latin accent was more a matter of pitch than of stress. Space does not allow the question of accent to be discussed here. It need only be said that in Latin every monosyllabic word has the accent, that dissyllables have the accent on the penultimate, and that words of more syllables than two have the accent on the antepenultimate if the penultimate is short, and on the penultimate if it is long.

THE METRIC SYSTEM.

The metric or decimal system, long in use in France, and now adopted in other European countries and to some extent in the United States and Great Britain, calls for special attention from its prominent importance among systems of weights and measures. It is based upon the metre, the unit of length, which is approximately $\frac{1}{10000000}$ part of the distance from the equator to the pole, or = 39.37 inches.

The SQUARE METRE is the unit of measure of small surfaces.

The ARE = 100 square metres, is the unit of measure for land surfaces.

The STERE, or CUBIC METRE, is the unit of measure for volumes.

The LITRE, a cube whose edges measure $\frac{1}{10}$ of a metre, is the unit of capacity.

The GRAMME, the weight of a cube of distilled water whose edges measure $\frac{1}{10}$ of a metre, is the unit of weight.

Long Measure.

1 millimetre = .001 metre = .039 inches.
1 centimetre = .01 " = .39 " "
1 decimetre = .1 " = 3.93 " "
1 metre = 3.28 feet.
1 decametre = 10 metres = 32.81 " "

COMMERCIAL MONEYS OF THE WORLD.

Argentine Republic.—The commercial standard is the peso nacional, divided into 100 centavos, and of a value in United States money of about 1 dollar. It is superseding the peso fuerte, which is about 3/4 per cent. higher in value. The paper money is depreciated nearly 50 per cent.

Australia.—Same as Great Britain.

Austria-Hungary.—The money of account is the new gulden or florin, of the value of 48 cents. It is divided into 100 kreutzers. The chief coins are: gold, 8 and 4 gulden pieces; silver, 2, 1, and 1/2 gulden, 20 and 10 kreutzers; copper, 4 and 1 kreutzer.

Belgium.—The monetary unit is the French franc, which is divided into 100 centimes. Its value in our money is 19.3 cents.

Bolivia.—The current coins are gold doubloons and silver dollars and their subdivisions. The national dollar is worth nearly $1.02, but the current peso or dollar is worth about 75 cents of our money. The new sol equals 5 francs, or 96.5 cents.

Brazil.—The money of account is the rei. 1000 reis, or 1 milrei, is equal to 54.6 cents, having become greatly depreciated from its original value of about $1.20. Treasury notes form almost the only circulating medium.

Burma.—No coin minted. Gold and silver bullion forms the circulating medium. It is estimated by the tical or kiat = 251 grains troy.

Canada.—The money of account is the dollar of 100 cents, equal at par to United States money. Accounts are usually kept in dollars and cents, but sometimes in pounds, shillings, and pence.

Cape of Good Hope.—Same as Great Britain.

Ceylon.—Accounts are generally in rupees, of about 40 cents intrinsic value, or in English coin. The currency consists of British and Spanish coins, rupees, copper fanams, and cowries, or little shells, used by the natives.

Chile.—The commercial unit is the peso corriente, of 100 centavos = 91.2 cents. The gold condor, nominally of 10 pesos, is depreciated nearly 6 per cent. in value below the silver money.

China.—Foreign merchants state their accounts in dollars and cents; the Chinese, in taels. The tael (taeng) equals 10 mace (taern), 100 candareens (fun), and 1000 cash (le). 720 taels are reckoned as worth $1000. The only coin in general use is the cash.

Colombia.—Money is reckoned in pesos or dollars of 5 reals, 100 centavos. The peso is worth 96.5 cents U. S. money. The gold coins are the 20, 10 (condor), 5, and 2 peso pieces; the silver, 1 peso, 20, 10, and 5 centavos.

Denmark.—The unit of exchange is the kroner or crown, divided into 100 ore, the value of the kroner being 26.8 cents. The coins are: gold, 20 and 10 kroners; silver, 2 and 1 kroner, 50, 40, 25, and 10 ore pieces.

Ecuador.—The money of account is the piastre or dollar, divided into 8 reals or 100 cents. Its value is about that of the United States dollar

Egypt.—The money of account is the piastre or kishr, divided into 40 fuddah or paras. American dollars are generally reckoned equal to 20 piastres.

France.—The commercial unit is the franc, divided into 100 centimes, and equal to 19.3 cents American money. There are gold coins of 100, 50, 20, 10, and 5 francs; silver of 5, 2, and 1 franc, 50 and 20 centimes.

Germany.—In 1873 the mark of 100 pfennige was made the unit of account. The mark is a silver coin, and the standard is a gold one, but its value is fixed from the 10 mark gold piece, worth $2.38 American, or 9 s. 9 1/2 d. English. The gold coins are 20, 10, and 5 marks; silver, 5, 2, and 1 mark, 50 and 20 pfennige; nickel, 10 and 5 pfennige; copper, 2 and 1 pfennige.

Great Britain.—The unit of value is the pound, worth about $4.86, 6 in American money. It is divided into 20 shillings, and these into 12 pence. The coins are: gold, 5, 2, 1, and 1/2 pound or sovereign; silver, crown (5 shillings), half-crown, shilling, sixpenny, fourpenny, and threepenny pieces; bronze, penny, halfpenny, and farthing.

Greece.—Accounts are reckoned in drachmi, which equals 1 franc and is divided into 100 lepta. The chief circulating medium is an inconvertible paper currency.

Holland.—The florin or guilder is here the monetary unit. It is divided into 100 cents, and equals in value 40.2 cents American.

India.—The rupee is the monetary unit. In accounts it is divided into 16 annas, each of 12 pice, and in Bombay sometimes into 4 quarters, each of 100 reis. The government rupee, the only one now minted, contains 165 troy grains of silver. Its nominal value is 2 s. English, or 48 cents American, though its intrinsic value varies.

Italy.—The unit of value is the lira italiana of 100 centesimi, these being respectively equal to the French franc and centime. The general circulating medium is a depreciated paper currency.

Japan.—Dollars, etc. have superseded the native coins. The yen or dollar is divided into 100 sens. It is about equal to the American dollar in value. The 10 yen piece equals the American eagle. The Japanese use government paper money called kensatsu and yen-satzu.

Java.—Accounts are stated in the florin or guilders of Holland. A variety of coins are in circulation.

Mexico.—The principal money of account in Mexico and throughout Central America is the piastre or dollar, which is divided into 8 reals or 100 cents. Its exchange value is about 98 cents. The gold and silver coins are: gold, 16, 8, 4, 2, and 1 dollar; silver, 1 dollar, 50 and 25 cents.

Morocco.—The money of account is the mitkul of 10 ounces, 40 blankets, or 960 fines. The mitkul is worth 50 cents American.

Norway.—The unit of value since 1877 has been the kronor or crown, divided into 100 ore. The value of these coins is the same as the equivalent coins of Denmark.

Persia.—The unit of account is the toman, an uncoined standard, divided into 8 reals, 10 sahib-karauns, 20 panabats, 50 abassia, 100 mamodis, 200 shahies, or 10,000 alens. In some places accounts are kept in piastres = 4 shahies. A purse is 50 to-mans, worth about $125.00.

Peru.—The unit is the piastre or peso of 100 centesimos. It is represented by the silver sol, a coin of the same value as the French 5 franc piece, or 96.5 cents.

Portugal.—The unit of account here is the rei; and 1000 reis is called a milrei, whose value is about $1.08. A million reis is termed a conto.

Roumania.—The monetary unit is the lei nuove of 100 bani, a coin about equal to the French franc in value. Russian and Austrian coins are largely used.

Russia.—The standard of value is the ruble, divided into 100 kopeks; its value is 77.2 cents. Accounts were formerly kept in paper or bank rubles, but in 1839 the silver ruble was made the only unit of value in the empire. There are numerous coins, of various titles, the largest being the gold imperial, of 10 rubles.

Siam.—The circulating medium consists only of silver and cowrie-shells. The general coin is the bat or tical, commonly valued at about 60 cents. It is divided into 4 salungs, 8 fuangs, 16 song-p'hais, 32 p'hai-nungs, or 6400 cowries.

Spain.—The unit of account since 1871 has been the silver peseta, of 4 reals or 100 centesimos, its value the same as the French franc. The gold coins consist of doubloons and pistoles. The real vellon, a very common coin, is worth 5 cents. The silver dollar, equal in value to the American dollar, is in common circulation.

Sweden.—The unit is the krona or crown of 100 ore, as in Denmark and Norway, and of the same value.

Switzerland.—The unit of account is the franc of 100 rappen or centimes, equal in value to the French franc. The coins are like those of France.

Tripoli.—The standard of value, as in Turkey, is the piastre of 40 paras. Its value is fluctuating. Commerce is conducted chiefly with Spanish dollars or 5 franc pieces.

Tunis.—Accounts are stated in piastres of 16 carobas or 52 aspers. The piastre is worth about 12 cents. Business is conducted in dollars and francs.

Turkey.—The piastre (grusch) is here the unit of account. It is divided into 40 paras or 120 aspers; also into 100 cents. The piastre is worth about 4.4 cents. The medjidie or lira, a gold coin, is worth $4.40.

United States.—The unit of value is the dollar, divided into 100 cents. The principal coins are: gold, the eagle (10 dollars), half-eagle, and quarter-eagle; silver, the dollar, half and quarter-dollar, and the dime (10 cents); nickel, the half-dime; bronze, the cent.

Venezuela.—The former unit of account was the peso or dollar of 100 cents, but it has been superseded by a new peso equal to 5 francs in value.

West Indies.—The money of account of the several islands agrees in general with that of the country to which they belong. In Cuba accounts are settled in dollars, divided into 100 cents, or 8 reals, each of 34 maravedia. The Spanish dollar agrees with that of the United States in value.

NAMES OF STATES AND TERRITORIES, AND THEIR DERIVATION.

- Alaska. An Indian title, spelled by the Russian explorers Al-ty-es-ka; since changed successively to Alaska, Alaksa, Alashka, and Alaska. When purchased by the United States several names were proposed, but Alaska was adopted at the suggestion of Charles Sumner.
- Alabama. A Muscogee Indian word, meaning "Here we rest," the name given by the Indians to the principal river of the State, and adopted in 1817 as the State name.
- Arkansas. Name adopted in 1819, from its principal river. Arkansas or Arkansas was the title given by the Algonquins to the tribe which called itself Qnappas. The pronunciation was fixed, by act of the State Legislature in 1881, as "Ar'kan-saw."
- Arizona. There are several derivations suggested: 1st, from an Indian word meaning "sand hills;" 2d, from Aztec Arizuma, meaning "silver-bearing;" 3d, from a goddess of the Zuni Indians, named Arizona.
- California. "Las Sergas de Esplandian," a Spanish romance published in 1510, has among its characters a queen named Calsina, living in an island kingdom named California, which is "rich with gold, diamonds, and pearls." Cortez is supposed to have given this name to the newly-discovered district of Lower California, from his hopes that it would prove a land of gold. Several other derivations have been suggested, but this seems the most probable.
- Colorado. Named from its principal river, whose name comes from a Spanish word signifying red or ruddy, the waters being reddened by sand, mud, etc. after heavy rains. But it may possibly have been derived from Vasquez Coronado, who led a Mexican body of explorers hither in 1540.
- Connecticut. From the Mohegan Indian word Quonaughtico, given to the river, and meaning either "long river" or "river of pines." The Indian word is variously spelled, Quinetuequet having the nearest resemblance to Connecticut.
- Dakota. So named from the Dakota Indians, a tribal name meaning "allied," and referring to the great confederacy of tribes inhabiting the region. Before this alliance the Dakotas were known as the Sioux.
- Delaware. This name was originally—in 1703—given to Delaware Bay, in honor of Lord De la War, governor of Virginia in 1611. The State adopted the name from the bay.
- District of Columbia. Columbia is the feminine form of the word Columbus, and as such may stand for the emblematic goddess of the country.
- Florida. This title was given by Ponce de Leon, who discovered the land on Easter Sunday, March 27, 1513. This day being called by the Spaniards Pascua Florida, "Holy Day of Flowers," he called the country Florida.
- Georgia. So named in honor of George II., king of England, who established a colony here in 1732.
- Idaho. Etah hoc, a phrase from the language of the Nez Percé Indians, descriptive of the gleam of the snowy mountain-summits in the sunlight, has been Anglized into Idaho, which is poetically converted into "gem of the mountains."
- Illinois. This name was adopted in 1809 from that of the Illinois River. It is said to come from the Indian word Illini, "men," and the French termination ois, "tribe." A derivation is also suggested from an island in the Mississippi abounding in nuts, and called by the French isle aux noix, "isle of nuts."
- Indiana. This title was adopted from the name Indian, which was applied in 1768 to a tract of land north of the Ohio River, then granted by the Indians to a company of traders.
- Iowa. Several derivations are suggested for the name of this State. 1st, the French corruption of Ajubbá, an Indian word meaning "the sleepy ones;" 2d, a Sioux name of the Pahoja tribe; 3d, the Indian word Ajawa, "across, beyond"—as "the tribe beyond the river," corrupted in French to Aioués, thence to Iowa.
- Kansas. Adopted in 1854, from the name of its principal river, which was so called from the Indian tribe known as Konsos or Kows, "smoky water." Spelt Kanson, Kanson, Kanzas, and finally, by legislative action, Kansas.
- Kentucky. Adopted in 1782, from its principal river. Trumbull derives it from an Indian word Kain-tuk-ee, "at the head of the river." It has also been supposed to come from an Algonquin word meaning "long river," and from Kentakchowa, "long prairies."
- Louisiana. Named by La Salle, in 1682, in honor of Louis XIV., king of France.
- Maine. Said to have been named by Sir Ferdinando Gorges, who obtained a royal grant of land in this region, in honor of Henrietta Maria, wife of Charles I., and to be derived from the French province of Maine, her patrimonial estate. But as there is no proof that she had anything to do with this province, and as the land seems to have been called The Main at an earlier date, it is probable that the name originated in the latter term.
- Maryland. This State was named from the queen mentioned in connection with Maine, Henrietta Maria, wife of Charles I. In the patent to Lord Baltimore it was named "Crescentia," but the king, on signing the patent, desired that the name should be changed to Terra Maria, "Mary's Land," in honor of his queen.
- Massachusetts. Several derivations of this word are suggested, the most probable being from the Natic Indian word Masaswet, whose approximate meaning is "the place of the great hills"—referring to the Blue Mountains.
- Michigan. From the name of the lake. Trumbull ascribes it to an Indian word meaning "a fish weir." The word Mitchikan occurs in the Ottawa dialect, and means "fences." Also ascribed to Algonquin and Chippewa words meaning "great lake."
- Minnesota. This State took its name from St. Peter's River, whose Indian name was Minni-solah, "muddy (or slightly turbid) water." When admitted as a State the names Itasca, Chippeway, Jackson, and Washington were proposed but rejected.
- Mississippi. Name adopted in 1790, from the great river. The original name of the river in Algonquin, as corrupted into French, is Méché Sébé, "the father of waters." This term was successively changed to Michi Sepe, Michisepe, Missipi, Missisipi, Mississippi, and finally Mississippi, it being thus gradually overloaded with consonants. Various other spellings are given.
- Missouri. From the Missouri River. The word is said to be a compound from two different languages—Mis, Algonquin, "great," and Souri, Dakota, "muddy." Other derivations are given, as Dakota Minné-shosha, "muddy water."
- Montana. From Spanish Montaña, "a mountain." The name was suggested to Hon. James Ashley, chairman of the House Committee on Territories, in 1864, and applies to the very mountainous character of the region embraced.
- Nebraska. This name is derived from the Indian name of the Platte River. It means "shallow water" or "water valley."
- Nevada. From the Sierra Nevada Mountains. Serrado, "acrated," Nevada, "snowy;" thence "snowy mountains."
- New Hampshire. So named by John Mason, who obtained title to this province in 1639, from the county of Hampshire, England, of whose town of Portsmouth he was governor.
- New Jersey. In 1664, when this district was conveyed by the Duke of York to Lord John Berkeley and Sir George Carteret, the conveyance provided that it should be called "Nova Casarea or New Jersey," in compliment to Carteret, who had defended the Isle of Jersey against the parliamentary armies.
- New Mexico. Named to distinguish it from "Old" Mexico. The name comes from that of the Aztec deity "Maxilli." The territory was named Nova Mexicana by Antonio de Espejo at the date of the settlement of Santa Fé.
- New York. This name was given in compliment to the Duke of York, afterward James II., to whom the province was granted in 1664.
- North Carolina. The name Carolina was given in 1564, when the district later known as "The Carolinas" was settled by Huguenots in the reign of Charles IX. of France. The English preserved the name, with a slight change of spelling, in honor of Charles II. of England. The colony was afterward divided into North and South Carolina.
- Ohio. So named from the Ohio River. The word is variously derived: from Iroquois Ohio, "beautiful;" from Ohio:peekhanne, "stream white with froth;" and from Seneca Ohepegahunda, "beautiful river."
- Oregon. This title is derived from the Spanish name for the wild sage or "artemisia," Orégana, which grows abundantly on the banks of the Columbia River, which hence was named the Oregana. The word was corrupted by the trappers to Oregon, and eventually applied, as Oregon, to the State. Other derivations have been suggested.
- Pennsylvania. William Penn's first purpose was to call his province "New Wales," but he afterward suggested the word Sylvania, to designate its forested condition. To this Charles II., in 1681, added the word "Penn," that the name might signify "Penn's woods."
- Rhode Island. Named from Rhode Island, in Narragansett Bay. The origin of the name is unknown. It may have been derived from the Isle of Rhodes in the Mediterranean, or possibly from the Dutch word Rood, "red," in reference to certain red clay banks, or from the reddish appearance given to it by its abundance of cranberries.
- South Carolina. See North Carolina. Carolina was divided into North and South in 1729.
- Tennessee. Name derived from that of its principal river, which in its turn came from Indian Tanensas, "river of the great bend;" or perhaps from Tenas See, a Cherokee village on its banks, said to mean "a curved spoon."
- Texas. Derived from Texas, "friendly," the name of a village inhabited by a small Indian tribe. Various other derivations are given, as Tejas or Texas "friends," Aztec Tehajas, "north country," Tejas, "the mound prairies," and the Tejas Indiana, mentioned by Vasquez Coronado.

Utah. This name was derived from that of the Ute, Utah, or Yuta tribe of Indians, the name meaning "dwellers in mountains." The Mormons wished it to be called Deseret, "honey bee," but the present name was adopted through the action of Hon. Edward Everett, then Secretary of State.

Vermont. From the French name, vert mont, which was given to the mountains of this section by the French of Canada, and adopted by the settlers in 1777 as the name of the State.

Virginia. Queen Elizabeth characterized the discovery of this region by Raleigh's expedition as the most glorious event of her reign, and in 1584 gave it the name of Virginia, as a memorial of her virgin or unmarried state.

Washington. So named, when formed into a Territory, in honor of George Washington.

West Virginia. So called on its separation from Virginia in 1863. It was at one time proposed to call it Kanawha, from its principal river.

Wisconsin. The Wisconsin River, from which the State was named, was entitled by Marquette Mascoussin, "wild rushing channel." This was changed into Ouisconsin, and thence to Wisconsin. There are various other spellings.

Wyoming. From the Wyoming Valley of Pennsylvania, whence emigrants came to this region. The word comes from the Delaware Indian m'cheuami or m'cheuwami, "great plain."
